MONDAY, SEVENTEENTH OF MAY, 1802.

MR. CURRAN ſtated the caſe for the plaintiff, in ſubſtance nearly to the following effect.

He began by telling the jury, it was the moſt extraordinary action he had ever met with. It muſt have proceeded from the moſt unexampled impudence in the plaintiff, if he has brought it wantonly; or the moſt unparalelled miſcreancy in the defendant, if it ſhall appear ſupported by proof. And the event muſt ſtamp the moſt condign and indelible diſgrace on the guilty defendant, unleſs an unworthy verdict ſhould ſhift the ſcandal upon another quarter. On the record the action he ſaid appeared ſhort and ſimple; it was an action of treſpaſs, vi et armis, for an aſſault, battery, and falſe impriſonment. But the facts that led to it, that explain its nature, and its enormity, and of courſe that ſhould meaſure the damages, were neither ſhort nor ſimple; the novelty of them might ſurpriſe, the atrocity muſt ſhock their feelings, if they had feelings to be ſhocked;—but he ſaid, he did not mean to addreſs himſelf to any of their proud feelings of liberty. The ſeaſon for that was paſt. There was indeed he ſaid, a time when, in addreſſing a jury upon very inferior violations of human rights, he had felt his boſom glow, and ſwell with the noble and elevating conſciouſneſs of being a Free-man, ſpeaking to Free-men, and in a Free Country; where, if he was not able to communicate the generous flame to their boſoms, he was not at leaſt ſo cold as not to catch it from them. But that was a ſympathy, which he was not now ſo fooliſh as to affect either to inſpire, or participate. He would not inſult them by the bitter mockery of ſuch an affectation; buried as they were, he did not wiſh to conjure up the ſhades of departed Freedom to flutter round their tomb, to haunt or to reproach them. Where freedom is no more, it is a miſchievous prophanation to uſe her language; becauſe it tends to deceive the man who is no longer free, upon the moſt important of all points; that is, the nature of the ſituation to which he is reduced; and to make him confound the licentiouſneſs of words, with the real poſſeſſion of freedom. He meant not therefore, he ſaid, to call for an haughty verdict, that might humble the inſolence of oppreſſion, or aſſert the fancied rights of Independence. Far from it; he only aſked for ſuch a verdict, as might make ſome reparation for the moſt extreme and unmerited ſuffering, and might alſo tend to ſome probable mitigation of the public, and general deſtiny. For this purpoſe, he ſaid, he muſt carry back their attention to the melancholy period of 1798. It was at that ſad criſis, that the defendant from an obſcure individual, ſtarted into notice and conſequence. It is in the hot-bed of public calamity, that ſuch portentous and inauſpicious products are accelerated without being matured. From being a town-major, a name ſcarcely legible in the liſt of public incumberances, he became at once inveſted with all the real powers of the moſt abſolute authority. The life and the liberty of every man ſeemed to be given up to his diſpoſal. With this gentleman's extraordinary elevation began began the ſtory of the ſufferings and ruin of the plaintiff. It ſeems a man of the name of M'Guire was proſecuted for ſome offence againſt the ſtate. Mr. Hevey the plaintiff by accident was in court; he was then a citizen of wealth and credit, a Brewer in the firſt line of that buſineſs. Unfortunately for him, he had therefore heretofore employed the witneſs for the proſecution, and found him a man of infamous character. Unfortunately for himſelf, he mentioned this circumſtance in Court. The counſel for the priſoner inſiſted on his being ſworn; he was ſo. The jury were convinced, that no credit was due to the witneſs for the crown; and the priſoner was accordingly acquitted. In a day or two after Major Sirr met the plaintiff in the ſtreet; aſked how he dared to interfere in his buſineſs, and ſwore by God he would teach him how to meddle with "his people." Gentlemen, ſaid Mr. Curran, there are two ſorts of prophets, one that derives its ſource from real or fancied inſpiration, and who are ſometimes miſtaken. But there is another claſs, who prophecy what they are determined to bring about themſelves. Of this ſecond, and by far the moſt authentic claſs, was the Major; for heaven you ſee has no monopoly of prediction. On the following evening, poor Hevey was dogged in the dark into ſome lonely alley; there he was ſeized he knew not by whom, nor by what authority —and became in a moment, to himſelf, to his family, and his friends, as if he had never been. He was carried away in equal ignorance of his crime, and of his deſtiny; whether to be tortured, or hanged, or tranſported. His crime he ſoon learned; it was the treaſon which he had committed againſt the majeſty of Major Sirr. He was immediately conducted to a new place of impriſonment in the Caſtle-yard, called the provoſt. Of this manſion of miſery, of which you have ſince heard ſo much, Major Sandys was, and I believe yet is, the keeper. A gentleman of whom I know how dangerous it is to ſpeak; and of whom every prudent man will think, and talk with all due reverence. He ſeemed a twin-ſtar of the defendant—equal in honour, in confidence; equal alſo, (for who could be ſuperior?) in probity and humanity. To this gentleman was my client conſigned, and in his cuſtody he remained about ſeven weeks, unthought of by the world, as if he had never exiſted. The oblivion of the buried, is as profound as the oblivion of the dead; his family may have mourned his abſence, or his probable death; but why ſhould I mention ſo paltry a circumſtance? The fears, or the ſorrows of the wretched, give no interruption to the general progreſs of things. The ſun roſe, and the ſun ſet, juſt as it did before—the buſineſs of the government, the buſineſs of the caſtle, of the feaſt, or the torture, went on with their uſual exactneſs and tranquillity. At laſt Mr. Hevey was diſcovered among the ſweepings of the priſon; and was at laſt to be diſpoſed of. He was at laſt honoured with the perſonal notice of Major Sandys.—"Hevey (ſays the Major,) I have ſeen you ride I think a ſmart ſort of mare; you can't uſe her here; you had better give me an order for her." The plaintiff, you may well ſuppoſe, by this time had a tolerable idea of his ſituation; he thought he might have much to fear from a refuſal, and ſomething to hope from compliance; at all events, he ſaw it would be a means of apprizing his family that he was not dead—he inſtantly gave the order required. The Major graciouſly accepted it, ſaying, your courteſy will not coſt you much, you are to be ſent down to morrow to Kilkenny to be tried for your life; you will moſt certainly be hanged; and you can ſcarcely think that your journey to the other world will be performed on horſeback. The humane, and honorable Major was equally a prophet with his compeer. The plaintiff on the next day took leave of his priſon, as he ſuppoſed for the laſt time, and was ſent under a guard to Kilkenny, then the head quarters of Sir Charles Aſgil, there to be tried by court-martial for ſuch crime, as might chance to be alleged againſt him. In any other country, the ſcene that took place on that occaſion might excite no little horror, and aſtoniſhment; but with us, theſe ſenſations are become extinguiſhed by frequency of repetition. I am inſtructed, that a proclamation was ſent forth, offering a reward to any man, who would come forward, and give any evidence againſt the traitor Hevey. An unhappy wretch, who had been ſhortly before condemned to die, and was then lying ready for execution, was allured by the propoſal. His integrity was not firm enough to heſitate long, between the alternative propoſed; pardon, favour, and reward, with perjury on one ſide; the rope and the gibbet on the other. His loyalty decided the queſtion againſt his ſoul. He was examined, and Hevey was appointed by the ſentence of a mild, mild, and no doubt, enlightened court-martial, to take the place of the witneſs, and ſucceed to the vacant halter. Hevey, you may ſuppoſe (continued Mr. Curran,) now thought his labours at an end; but he was miſtaken: his hour was not yet come. You are probably Gentlemen, or you my Lord are accounting for his eſcape, by the fortunate recollection of ſome early circumſtances, that might have ſmote upon the ſenſibility of Sir Charles Aſgil, and made him believe, that he was in debt to Providence for the life of one innocent, though convicted victim. But it was not ſo; his eſcape was purely accidental. The proceedings upon his Trial, happened to meet the eye of Lord Cornwallis. The freaks of fortune are not always cruel; in the bitterneſs of her jocularity, you ſee ſhe can adorn the miſcreancy of the ſlave, in the trappings of power, and rank, and wealth. But her playfulneſs is not always inhuman; ſhe will ſometimes in her gambols, fling oil upon the wounds of the ſufferer; ſhe will ſometimes ſave the captive from the dungeon and the grave, were it only, that ſhe might afterwards reconſign him to his deſtiny, by the repriſal of capricious cruelty upon fantaſtic commiſeration. Lord Cornwallis read the tranſmiſs of Hevey's condemnation; his heart recoiled from the detail of ſtupidity and barbarity. He daſhed his pen acroſs the odious record, and ordered that Hevey ſhould be forthwith liberated. I cannot but highly honor him for his conduct in this inſtance; nor, when I recollect his peculiar ſituation at that diſaſtrous period, can I much blame him for not having acted towards that court, with the ſame vigour and indignation, which he has ſince ſhewn with reſpect to thoſe abominable juriſdictions. Hevey was now a man again—he ſhook the duſt of his feet againſt his priſon gate: his heart beat the reſponſe to the anticipated embrace of his family, and his friends, and he returned to Dublin. On his arrival here, one of the firſt perſons he met was his old friend, Major Sandys. In the eye of poor Hevey, juſtice and humanity had ſhorn the Major of his beams—he no longer regarded him with reſpect or terror. He demanded his mare; obſerving, that though he might have travelled to heaven on foot, he thought it more comfortable to perform his earthly journeys on horſeback. Ungrateful villain, ſaid the Major; is this the gratitude you ſhew to his majeſty and to me, for our clemency to you? You ſhan't get poſſeſſion of the beaſt, beaſt, which you have forfeited by your treaſon, nor can I ſuppoſe, that a noble animal, that had been honoured with conveying the weight of duty and allegiance, could condeſcend to load her loyal loins with the vile burden of a convicted traitor. As to the Major (ſaid Mr. Curran) I am not ſurpriſed that he ſpoke and acted as he did. He was no doubt aſtoniſhed at the impudence, and novelty of calling the privileges of official plunder into queſtion. Hardened by the numberleſs inſtances of that mode of unpuniſhed acquiſition, he had erected the frequency of impunity into a ſort of warrant of ſpoil and rapine. One of theſe inſtances, I feel, I am now bringing to the memory of your Lordſhip. A learned and reſpected brother barriſter, had a ſilver cup; the Major heard that for many years it had borne an inſcription of "Irin go brach," which means "Ireland for ever." The Major conſidered this perſeverance in guilt for ſuch a length of years, as a forfeiture of the delinquent veſſel. My poor friend was accordingly robbed of his cup. But, upon writing to the then Attorney-General, that excellent officer felt the outrage, as it was his nature to feel every thing that was barbarous or baſe; and the Major's loyal ſide-board was condemned to the grief of reſtitution. And here, (ſaid Mr. Curran) let me ſay in my own defence, that this is the only occaſion, upon which I have ever mentioned this circumſtance with the leaſt appearance of lightneſs. I have often told the ſtory in a way that it would not become me to tell it here. I have told it in the ſpirit of thoſe feelings, which were excited at ſeeing, that one man could be ſober and humane at a criſis, when ſo many thouſands were drunk and barbarous. And probably my ſtatement was not ſtinted by the recollection, that I held that perſon in peculiar reſpect and regard. But little does it ſignify, whether acts of moderation and humanity are blazoned by gratitude, by flattery or by friendſhip; they are recorded in the heart from which they ſprung: and, in the hour of adverſe viciſſitude, if it ſhould ever come, ſweet is the odour of their memory, and precious is the balm of their conſolation. But to return; Hevey brought an action for his mare. The Major not chooſing to come into Court, and thereby ſuggeſt the probable ſucceſs of a thouſand actions, reſtored the property, and paid the coſts of the ſuit, to the Attorney of Mr. Hevey. It may perhaps ſtrike you, my Lord, ſaid Mr. Curran, as if I was ſtating, what was not relevant to the action. It is materially pertinent; I am ſtating a ſyſtem of concerted vengeance and oppreſſion. Theſe two men acted in concert; they were Archer and Aimwell. You Maſter at Lichfield and I at Coventry. You plunderer in the jail, and I tyrant in the ſtreet. And in our reſpective ſituations, we will co-operate in the common cauſe of robbery, and vengeance. And I ſtate this (ſaid Mr. Curran) becauſe I ſee Major Sandys in court. And becauſe, I feel I can prove the fact, beyond the poſſibility of denial. If he does not dare to appear, ſo called upon, as I have called upon him, I prove it by his not daring to appear. If he does venture to come forward, I will prove it by his own oath, or if he ventures to deny a ſyllable, that I have ſtated, I will prove by irrefragable evidence of record that his denial is falſe, and perjured. Thus far, Gentlemen, (ſaid Mr. Curran) we have traced the plaintiff through the ſtrange viciſſitudes of barbarous impriſonment, of atrocious condemnation, and of accidental deliverance. (Here Mr. Curran deſcribed the feelings of himſelf and his family, upon his reſtoration; his difficulties on his return; his ſtruggle againſt the aſperſions on his character; his renewed induſtry; his gradual ſucceſs; the implacable malignity of Sirr and of Sandys; and the immediate cauſe of the preſent action. Three years (ſaid Mr. Curran) had elapſed, ſince the deliverance of my client; the public atmoſphere had cleared—the private deſtiny of Hevey ſeemed to have brightened, but the malice of his enemies had not been appeaſed. On the 8th of September laſt, Mr. Hevey was ſitting in a public coffee-houſe, Major Sirr was there. Mr. Hevey was informed that the major had at that moment ſaid, that he (Hevey) ought to have been hanged. The plaintiff was fired at the charge; he fixed his eye on Sirr, and aſked, if he had dared to ſay ſo. Sirr declared that he had; and had ſaid truly. Hevey anſwered that he was a ſlanderous ſcoundrel. At the inſtant Sirr ruſhed upon him, and aſſiſted by three or four of his ſatellites, who had attended him in diſguiſe, ſecured him and ſent him to the caſtle-guard, deſiring that a receipt might be given for the villain. He was ſent thither. The officer of the guard chanced to be an Engliſhman, but lately arrived in Ireland, he ſaid to the bailiffs, if this was in England, I ſhould think this gentleman entitled to bail; but I don't don't know the laws of this country. However I think you had better looſen thoſe irons on his wriſts, or I think they may kill him.

Lord

Major Sirr, the defendant, ſoon arrived, went into his office, and returned withan order which he had written, and by virtue of which Mr. Hevey wasconveyed to the cuſtody of his old friend and gaoler, Major Sandys. Here he was flung into a room of about thirteen feet by twelve—it was called, the hoſpital of the provoſt.—It was occupied by ſix beds, in which were to lie fourteen or fifteen miſerable wretches, ſome of them ſinking under contagious diſeaſes. On his firſt entrance, the light that was admitted by the opening of the door, diſcloſed to him a view of the ſad fellow-ſufferers, for whoſe loathſome ſociety he was once more to exchange the chearful haunts of men, the uſe of open air, and of his own limbs; and where he was condemned to expiate the diſloyal hatred and contempt, which he had dared to ſhew to the overweening and felonious arrogance of ſlaves in office, and minions in authority; here he paſſed the firſt night, without bed or food. The next morning, his humane keeper, the Major, appeared. The plaintiff demanded, " why he was ſo impriſoned," complained of hunger, and aſked for the jail allowance. Major Sandys replied with a torrent of abuſe, which he concluded by ſaying—" Your crime is your inſolence to Major Sirr; however, he diſdains to trample upon you — you may appeaſe him by proper and contrite ſubmiſſion; but unleſs you do ſo, you ſhall rot where you are.—I tell you this, that if government do not protect us, by God we will not protect them. You will probably, (for I know your inſolent and ungrateful hardineſs,) attempt to get out by an Habeas Corpus; but in that you will find yourſelf miſtaken, as ſuch a raſcal deſerves." Hevey was inſolent enough to iſſue an Habeas Corpus, and a return was made upon it— " that Hevey was in cuſtody under a warrant from General Craigh, on a charge of treaſon." That this return was a groſs falſehood, fabricated by Sirr, I am inſtructed to aſſert. —Let him prove the truth of it, if he can. The Judge, before whom this return was brought, felt, that he had no authority to liberate the unhappy priſoner; and thus, by a moſt inhaman and audacious lie, my client was again remanded to the horrid manſion of peſtilence and famine.

Mr.

Mr. Curran proceeded to deſcribe the feelings of Mr. Hevey, the deſpair of his friends—the ruin of his affairs—the inſolence of Sandys—his offer to ſet him at large, on condition of making an abject ſubmiſſion to Sirr—the indignant rejection of Hevey—the ſupplication of his father and ſiſter, rather to ſubmit to an enemy, however baſe and odious, than periſh in ſuch a ſituation;—the repugnance of Hevey—the repetition of kind remonſtrance, and the final ſubmiſſion of Hevey to their entreaties;—his ſigning a ſubmiſſion, dictated by Sandys, and his enlargement from confinement. Thus, ſaid Mr. Curran, was he kicked from his jail into the common maſs of his fellow-ſlaves, by yielding to the tender entreaties of the kindred that loved him, to ſign, what was in fact, a releaſe of his claim to the common rights of an human creature, by humbling himſelf to the brutal arrogance of a pampered ſlave. But he did ſuffer the dignity of his nature to be ſubdued by it's kindneſs;—he has been enlarged, and he has brought the preſent action. As to the facts that he had ſtated, Mr. Curran ſaid, he would make a few obſervations:—it might be ſaid for the defendant, that much of what was ſtated, may not appear in proof. To that, he ſaid, he would not have ſo ſtated, if he had not ſeen Major Sandys in Court; he had therefore put the facts againſt him in a way, which he thought the moſt likely to rouze him to a defence of his own character, if he dared to be examined as a witneſs. He had he truſted, made him feel, that he had no way of eſcaping univerſal deteſtation, but by denying thoſe charges, if they were falſe, and if they were not denied, being thus publickly aſſerted, his entire caſe was admitted—his original oppreſſion in the provoſt was admitted—his robbery of the cup was admitted—his robbery of the mare was admitted—the lie ſo audaciouſly forged on the Habeas Corpus was admitted—the extortion of the infamous apology was admitted.—Again, ſaid Mr. Curran, I challenge this worthy compeer of a worthy compeer, to make his election, between proving his guilt by his own corporal oath, or by the more credible modeſty of his ſilence. And now, ſaid Mr. Curran, I have given you a mere ſketch of this extraordinary hiſtory. No country governed by any ſettled laws, or treated with common humanity, could furniſh any occurrences of ſuch unparalleled atrocity, and if the author of Caleb Williams, or of the Simple Story, were to read the tale of this man's ſufferings, it might I think humble the vanity of their talents, (if they are not too proud to be vain,) when they ſaw how much a more fruitful ſource of incident could be found in the infernal workings of the heart of a malignant ſlave, than in the richeſt copiouſneſs of the moſt fertile and creative imagination. But it is the deſtiny of Ireland to be the ſcene of ſuch horrors, and to be ſtung by ſuch reptiles to madneſs and to death. And now, ſaid Mr. Curran, I feel a ſort of melancholy pleaſure, in getting nearly rid of this odious and nauſeous ſubject. It remains to me only to make a few obſervations as to the damages you ought to give, if you believe the caſe of the plaintiff to be, as I have ſtated. I told you before, that neither pride nor ſpirit belong to our ſituation, I ſhould be ſorry to inflame you into any apiſh affectation of the port or ſtature of freedom or independence. But my advice to you, is to give the full amount of the damages laid in the declaration; and I'll tell you why I give you that advice: I think no damages could be exceſſive, either as a compenſation for the injury of the plaintiff, or as a puniſhment of the ſavage barbarity of the defendant, but my reaſons for giving you this advice, lye much deeper than ſuch conſiderations; they ſpring from a view of our preſent moſt forlorn, and diſaſtrous ſituation. You are now in the hands of another country, that country has no means of knowing your real condition, except from the information that ſhe may accidentally derive from tranſactions of a public nature. No printer would dare to publiſh the thouſand inſtances of atrocity, which we have witneſſed as hideous as the preſent, nor any one of them, unleſs he did it in ſome ſort of confidence, that he could ſcarcely be made a public ſacrifice by brutal force, for publiſhing, what was openly proved in a Court of Juſtice. Mr. Curran, here made ſome pointed obſervations on the ſtate of a country, where the freedom of the preſs is extinguiſhed, and where another nation, by whoſe indolent mercy, or whoſe inſtigated fury we may be ſpared, or ſacrificed, can know nothing of the extent of our ſufferings, or our delinquency, but by caſual hearſay. I know, ſaid he, that thoſe philoſophers have been abuſed, who think that men are born in a ſtate of war. I confeſs I go further, and firmly think they cannot be reclaimed to a ſtate of peace. When I ſee the conduct of man to man, I believe it.

it. When I see the list of offences in every criminal code in Europe—when I compare the enormity of their crimes, with the still greater enormity of their punishments, I retain no doubt upon the subject. But, if I could hesitate as to men in the same community, I have no doubt of the inextinguishable malignity, that will for ever inflame nation against nation. Well was it said, that a "nation has no heart;" towards each other they are uniformly envious, vindictive, oppressive, and unjust. What did Spain feel for the murders or the robberies of the West?—Nothing. And yet, at that time, she prided herself as much as England ever did on the elevation of her sentiment, and the refinement of her morality. Yet what an odious spectacle did she exhibit? her bosom burning with all the fury of rapine and tyranny; her mouth full of the pious praises of the living God, and her hands red with the blood of his innocent and devoted creatures. When I advise you therefore to mark your feelings of the case before you, don't think I mean, that you could make any general impression on the morality, or tenderness of the country, whose property we are become. I am not so foolish as to hope any such effect; practical justice and humanity are virtues that require laborious acts, and mortifying privations; expect not therefore to find them; appeal not to them. But there are principles and feelings substituted in their place, a stupid preference and admiration of self, an affectation of humanity, and a fondness for unmerited praise, these you may find, for they cost nothing; and upon them you may produce some effect. When outrages of this kind are held up to the world, as done under the sanction of their authority, they must become odious to mankind, unless they let fall some reprobation on the immediate instruments, and abettors of such deeds. An Irish Lord Lieutenant will shrink from the imputation of countenancing them. Great Britain will see, that it cannot be her interest to encourage an infernal spirit of subaltern barbarity, that reduces man to a condition lower than that of the beast of the field. They will be ashamed of employing such instruments, as the present defendant. When the goverment of Ireland lately gave up the celebrated O'Brien to the hands of the executioner, I have no little reason to believe that they suffered as they deserved on the occasion. I have no doubt, but that your verdict of this day, if you act as you ought to do, will produce a similar effect. And, as to England, I cannot too often inculcate upon you, that she knows nothing of our situation. When the torture was the daily and ordinary system of the executive government, it was denied in London, with a profligacy of effrontery, equal to the barbarity with which it was exhibited in Dublin; and, if the facts that shall appear to-day, should be stated at the other side of the water, I make no doubt, but very near one hundred worthy persons would be ready to deny their existence upon their honour, or if necessary, upon their oaths.

I cannot also but observe to you, continued Mr. Curran, that the real state of one country is more forceably impressed on the attention of another, by a verdict on such a subject as this, than it could be by any general description. When you endeavour to convey an idea of a great number of barbarians, practising a great variety of cruelties upon an incalculable multitude of sufferers, nothing defined or specific finds its way to the heart, nor is any sentiment excited, save that of a general erratic unappropriated commiseration. If, for instance, you wished to convey to the mind of an English matron, the horrors of that direful period, when, in defiance of the remonstrance of the ever to be lamented Abercromby, our poor people were surrendered to the lincentious brutality of the soldiery, by the authority of the state; you would vainly endeavour to give her a general picture of lust, and rapine, and murder, and conflagration. By endeavouring to comprehend every thing, you would convey nothing. When the father of poetry wishes to pourtray the movements of contending armies, and an embattled field, he exemplifies only, he does not describe; he does not venture to describe the perplexed and promiscuous conflicts of adverse hosts, but by the acts and fates of a few individuals he conveys a notion of the vicissitudes of the fight and the fortunes of the day. So should your story to her keep clear of generalities; instead of exhibiting the picture of an entire province, select a single object; and even if that single object do not release the imagination of your hearer from it's task, by giving more than an outline, take a cottage; place the affrighted mother of her orphan daughters at the door, the paleness of death upon her face, and more than its agonies in her heart; her aching eye, her anxious ear, ſtruggle through the miſts of cloſing day, to catch the approaches of deſolation, and diſhonour. The ruffian gang arrives, the feaſt of plunder begins, the cup of madneſs kindles in its circulation. The wandering glances of the raviſher become concentrated upon the ſhrinking and devoted victim.—You need not dilate, you need not expatiate; the unpolluted mother, to whom you tell the ſtory of horror, beſeeches you not to proceed; ſhe preſſes her child to her heart, ſhe drowns it in her tears, her fancy catches more than an angel's tongue could deſcribe; at a ſingle view ſhe takes in the whole miſerable ſucceſſion of force, of profanation, of deſpair, of death. So it is in the queſtion before us. If any man ſhall hear of this day's tranſaction, he cannot be ſo fooliſh as to ſuppoſe that we have been confined to a ſingle character, like thoſe now brought before you. No, Gentlemen; far from it; he will have too much common ſenſe, not to know, that outrages like this are never ſolitary, that, where the public calamity generates imps like theſe, their number is, as the ſands of the ſea, and their fury, as inſatiable as its waves. I am therefore anxious, that our maſters ſhould have one authenticated example of the treatment, which our unhappy country ſuffers under the ſanction of their authority; it will put a ſtrong queſtion to their humanity, if they have any, to their prudence, if their pride will let them liſten to it; or at leaſt, to that anxiety for reputation, to that pretention to the imaginary virtues of mildneſs and mercy, to which even thoſe countries the moſt diveſted of them, are ſo ready to aſſert their claim, and ſo credulouſly diſpoſed to believe that claim allowed.

There are ſome conſiderations reſpecting yourſelves, and the defendant, to which I ſhould wiſh to ſay a word. You may perhaps think your perſons unſafe, if you find a verdict againſt ſo conſiderable a perſon. I know his power, as well as you do—I know he might ſend you to the provoſt, as he has done the plaintiff, and forge a return on any writ you might iſſue for your deliverance—I know there is no ſpot in this devoted nation, (except that on which we now are,) where the ſtory of oppreſſion can be told or heard; but I think you can have no well founded apprehenſions. There is a time, when cruelty and oppreſſion become ſatiated and fatigued; in that ſatiety at leaſt, you will find yourſelves ſecure. But there is ſtill a better ſecurity for you: the gratitude tude of the worthy defendant—if any thing could add to his honours, and his credit, and his claims, it would be your verdict for the plaintiff; for in what inſtance have you ever ſeen any man ſo effectually accredited and recommended, as by the public execration? what a man for inſtance, might not O'Brien have been, if the envy of the gibbet had not arreſted the career of his honours and preferments? In every point of view, therefore, I recommend to you to find, and to find liberally for the plaintiff. I have founded my advice upon the real circumſtances of your ſituation; I have not endeavoured to ſtimulate you into any ſilly hectic of fancied liberty. I do not call upon you to expoſe yourſelves by the affectation of vindicating the cauſe of freedom, and humanity; much leſs do I wiſh to exhibit ourſelves to thoſe, whoſe property we are, as indignant or contumacious, under their authority. Far from it, they are unqueſtionably the the proprietors of us, they are intitled of right to drive us, and to work us; but we may be permitted modeſtly to ſuggeſt, that for their own ſakes, and for their own intereſt, a line of moderation may be drawn. That there are exceſſes of infliction, that human nature cannot bear. With reſpect to her weſtern Negroes, Great Britain has had the wiſdom, and humanity to feel the juſtice of this obſervation, and in ſome degree to act upon it; and I have too an high opinion of that great, and philoſophical nation, not to hope, that ſhe might think us, not undeſerving of equal mildneſs; provided it did not interfere with her juſt authority over us. It would, I ſhould even think, be for her credit, that having the honour of ſo illuſtrious a rider, we ſhould be kept in ſome ſort of condition, ſomewhat bordering upon ſpirit, which cannot be maintained, if ſhe ſuffers us to be utterly broken down, by the malicious wantonneſs of her grooms and jockeys. Mr. Curran, concluded by ſaying, that the cauſe was of no inconſiderable expectation, and that in whatever light the Jury regarded it; whether with reſpect to the two countries, or to Ireland ſingly, or to the parties concerned, or to their own ſenſe of character and public duty, or to the natural conſequences that muſt flow from the event, they ought to conſider it with the moſt profound attention, before they agreed upon their verdict.

JAMES MOLLOY, ESQ. sworn—examined by MR. M'NALLY.

Q. Do you know Major Sirr?

A. I do.

Q. Do you know Mr. John Hevey?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect being in the Commercial Buildings last September?

A. I do; there was some conversation between Major Sirr and Mr. Hevey, on the evening of the 8th of September—Mr. Sirr said to plaintiff, "You ought to be hanged." On which Mr. Hevey said, "You lie, but you ought to be hanged." I then saw Mr. Sirr come over from the place he was sitting at, and take hold of Mr. Hevey by the collar, and said, "I arrest you in the King's name; I will commit you to prison." This is as far as I can recollect; Mr. Sirr was not in my company. In the course of the conversation, Mr. Sirr said to Hevey, "I know you, your name is Hevey."

Q. What did Mr. Sirr say to Mr. Hevey?

A. Why my Lord, there was different expressions made use of, which I do not recollect; when Hevey was told that Major Sirr said, "he ought to be hanged," he turned about, and looked over at him, and Mr. Hevey has always rather a strong stern look, but then it must be worse, he replied to Major Sirr, "You lie; you said, 'you ought to be hanged;' "and I will make you prove it."—Sirr then said, "You ought to be hanged, and I dare say you and your party think so," or words to that purpose; and Hevey said, "I am no party;"—then said Mr. Sirr, "I arrest you in the King's name;" and they came to the coffee-house door; and I turned about and left the passage open to them.—Sirr said to Hevey, "You ought to be hanged,"—and then Hevey said to Sirr, "You lie."—Sirr said, "I arrest you this moment in the King's name; and you must come with me."—Hevey then said, "I will go out with you, where you please. Hevey and Sirr then went out of the coffee-room; and and Sirr and Hevey walked arm in arm together through Dame-ſtreet.—That is all I know of the tranſaction.

A. I recollect Sirr ſaying to Hevey, "You ought to be hanged."

A. I believe he was.

Mr. Curran—He was tried at Kilkenny, and was pardoned; and when Mr. Sirr ſaw him in September 1801, in the

MR. SAMUEL RAINEY, ſworn—examined by COUNSELLOR ORR.

Q. Do you know Mr. Sirr?

A. I do.

Q. Do you know Mr. Hevey?

A. I do: I never ſaw him to know him before September laſt. I went to the commercial coffee-houſe on the evening of the 8th of September laſt. After ſome converſation, Mr. Sirr ſaid to Mr. Hevey, "I will let you know who I am." Mr. Hevey made anſwer and ſaid, "I defy you." Some other words paſſed, Mr. Sirr ſaid to Mr. Hevey, "You ought to be hanged,"—then Mr. Hevey anſwered, "By God you lie."—Mr. Sirr then ſaid, "I will make you prove it."

Q. Did Sirr tell Hevey what he arreſted him for?

A. Not that I heard—they went out together. I returned to the coffee-houſe.

CROSS-EXAMINED by WILLIAM PLUNKETT, ESQ.

Q. Do you know was Mr. Sirr a Magiſtrate for the County of Dublin?

Q. He was a good deal employed in taking up perſons who were active in the Rebellion?

A. I was told ſo.

Q. What do you mean by the word active?

A. (Counſellor Curran). Why to be ſure, he means an active young man—is it not ſo?

A. (Witneſs). Yes.

Q. Do you believe he was found guilty?

A. I cannot tell whether or not.

Mr. Barrington. The whole proceedings of the Court Martial, was ſet aſide by Lord Cornwallis, who reverſed the ſentence of the Court.

Mr. PATRICK MAGUIRE, ſworn—examined by COUNSELLOR WALLACE.

Q. Do you know Mr. Sirr?

A. I do.

Q. Do you know Mr. Hevey?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect the month of September laſt?

A. I do.

Q. Have you heard of any thing which then happened to plaintiff?

A. Yes; he was taken into cuſtody by Mr. Sirr, and committed to the provoſt.

Q. Had you any difficulty in getting to ſee him?

A. Yes; by much, as I could not ſee him.

Q. Did you do any thing in conſequence?

A. I did; I went by the order of Major Sandys, to ſee Mr. Hevey in the provoſt. He ſaid he was in cuſtody of Major Sandys, under a warrant from Mr. Sirr.

Q. What did you then do?

A. I returned to Major Sandys, and ſaid to him, I wondered he would detain Mr. Hevey, on ſo trifling a matter—and Sandys replied, it was not a trifle to inſult Sirr who was in the truſt of government, and Mr. Hevey would be humbled, or elſe he ſhould ſtay where he was; that he ſhould make a public apology, e're he would be enlarged; and if you call on Sirr, and tell him this is done, and if Mr. Sirr is ſatisfied, I will then diſcharge him on your interference.

Q. Did you call on Sirr?

A. I waited on him on the 9th of September, and he replied, he did not wiſh to hold him longer, but to ſhew you it was not Hevey that ſhould be detained, he ſaid, if I would find find out the fellow who told Hevey what I ſaid, he would puniſh him. I then ſaid, if you write now to Mr. Sandys, he will diſcharge Hevey, and I required a letter, and he replyed, you will tell Mr. Sandys, by the ſame token, the laſt converſation I had with Major Sandys, in the caſtle-yard, was on Hevey's buſineſs, he will be diſcharged.

Q. Did you then call on Sandys?

A. I did.

Q. What did he then ſay?

A. He told me the token was right, and that if Hevey ſigned the apology he left him, he would diſcharge him, and deſired I would go into the room, and cauſe him to ſign ſaid paper.

Q. Did you then go?

A. I did.

Q. What ſort of a place did you ſee Mr. Hevey in?

A. I ſaw him in the provoſt priſon.

Q. Deſcribe the priſon, or where you have ſeen Mr. Hevey.

A. I cannot deſcribe it properly

Q. You muſt deſcribe it?

A. I ſaw Mr. Hevey in a ſmall room, (to the beſt of my recollection) where the firſt object I ſaw was a man, ſitting in a ſituation that delicacy prevents me from repeating, with a yellow ſhirt, and ſeemingly quite exhauſted. Five or ſix beds; in one of the beds was a man ſitting up in it, his perſon filthy and a long beard, with a ſoldier's old coat laid over his ſhoulders. I ſaw a third man walking about reading, I ſuppoſe it was a prayer-book, and he reading the office of the dead.

Lord Kilwarden. Did you ſee the book?

A. No, my Lord.

Q. Then how can you ſwear it was a prayer-book?

A. My Lord, I thought it was from the horrid appearance of the place; I was ſo alarmed, and the ſtench was ſo offenſive from the room, that I refuſed to go farther than the door, leaſt I ſhould get ſome diſorder, for the beds ſeemed to be full of people in ſickneſs. I ſpoke to Mr. Hevey about his dreadful ſituation, and requeſted him to ſign the apology that Major Sirr required, or to do any thing to get out of ſuch a place; which Hevey refuſed. I then went to Sirr in the caſtle-yard, and begged of him to liberate Mr. Hevey.

I told Mr. Sirr I would pay Mr. Hevey's expences. After ſome converſation, he ſaid, he had arreſted Mr. Hevey in vindication of his own honour, and ſaid he would leave it to Mr Sandys to get Mr Hevey diſcharged. Mr. Sirr gave me no note to Mr. Sandys, to get Mr. Hevey diſcharged; who I then told, that the friends of Mr. Hevey muſt get him liberated, by applying to the law for redreſs: I then went to Mr. Sandys, this was the next day after Mr. Hevey was arreſted. I ſaw Mr. Sandys, I told him what Mr. Sirr had ſaid, and Mr. Sandys ſaid, I muſt excuſe him—I am, ſaid he, in an awkward ſituation; as Mr. Hevey is confined under a General Officer's warrant, and that it muſt be an order from Mr Abbot only, that could now do it.—However, if proper authority is left with me, I will diſcharge him forthwith; and he adviſed me to go into Mr Hevey's room, to get him to ſign an apology; and then ſaid he, I will diſcharge him, but except he ſigns that paper, he ſaid he could not—he ſaid he would not diſcharge Mr. Hevey, unleſs he ſigned that apology. I then went to Mr. Hevey again, and intreated him to ſign the apology; at firſt he refuſed, but at laſt he ſaid, he would ſign it; and he having ſigned it, we parted. Mr. Sandys told me, that if Hevey ſigned the apology, he would have him diſcharged that day:

Q. When was Mr. Hevey liberated?

A. On the 11th of September, about twelve o'clock at noon.

CROSS-EXAMINED by JONAS GREEN, ESQ.

Q. Was you preſent at the converſation between plaintiff and defendant in the commercial coffee-room?

A. I was not.

Q. You ſay that Mr. Hevey objected at firſt to ſign the apology?

A. Yes—but he afterwards ſigned an apology to Major Sirr.

Q. You called at the priſon to ſee Mr. Hevey?

A. I did.

Q. Did you ſee Mr. Sirr there?

A. I never ſaw Mr. Sirr there.

Q. Are you a relation to Mr. Hevey?

A. No: but I have been in habits of intimacy with him a conſiderable time back.

Q. You

Q. You have been in company with him?

A. Yes.

Q. He was a Yeoman?

A. Yes: I saw him in uniform.

Q. When did he ceaſe to be a Yeoman?

A. Some time about the year 1799; I do not know the time preciſely.

Q. Did you ever hear of any act done by him, before that period?

A. I had been out of the kingdom, and returned 1ſt of June 1798. I was not a Yeoman.

Q. Have not you heard, that Mr Hevey was brought to trial at Kilkenny?

A. I have heard it, and do believe it to be the caſe.

Q. Did you hear that Mr. Hevey was ſentenced to tranſportation out of the kingdom for ſeven years?

A. Yes: but to what part of the world I never heard.

Q. Did you never hear that Hevey had been confined in the Royal Exchange?

A. I was not preſent, if he was confined in the Royal Exchange.

Q. Did you not hear he was taken up as a ſuſpected Yeoman?

A. I never heard that to my knowledge—I am poſitive I never heard it.

Q. Have you heard why the ſentence of tranſportation was not put in execution?

A. I cannot anſwer that queſtion.

Lord Kilwarden—You cannot aſk the witneſs as to the motive that induced Lord Cornwallis to liberate that man; it has been ſtated he was liberated by Lord Cornwallis, of courſe, Hevey has been forgiven. The witneſs cannot know the motive that produced his Lordſhip's clemency.

Q. Did Hevey make an apology to Mr. Sirr?

A. No—here is an apology drawn up by Major Sandys, which Mr. Hevey would not ſign.

Whereas I, on the night of the 8th of September laſt inſtant, in the coffee-room of the Commercial Buildings, made uſe of improper expreſſions to Mr. Sirr—I am very ſorry for it, and beg your's (Mr. Sirr's) pardon, and aſſure you, I had, nor have not, any wiſh to inſult any Officer of this Government; to whose clemency I owe my release from a sentence of a Court-martial, by reversing the sentence inflicted on me, by that Court-martial, &c.

11th September 1801.

Mr Fletcher. There was an apology made by plantiff.

A. There was one signed by Hevey, here it is.

Mr. Green. So far as it is the act of the Party, it may be read; here is the paper, signed by Hevey himself.

Sir, replied hastily to an officer of Government some nights ago, for which I am since confined; I am sorry by so doing, it has gave offence to government.

11th September, 1801. I am Sir,

To Yours, &c. &c.

Major Sandys. JOHN HEVEY.

Mr. Curran. Here was not any thing like an authority to discharge him.

Lord Kilwarden. At present I think Mr. Sandys acted merely as Agent of Mr. Sirr—he was committed to his custody by Mr. Sirr.

Mr. Barrington. There was no charge of High Treason against Mr. Hevey in September last.

Council for Defendant. We have the evidence of the former witness he did say, that Mr. Sirr said, he did not want any apology at all; and when he heard that Mr Hevey said he would appeal to the law; then said Mr. Sirr to the witness I will go to Mr. Abbet and get the man released.

Court. Do you rest the case here on the part of the plaintiff.

Council for Plaintiff. Yes, my Lord.

William Fletcher Esq. My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury, In this case I am of Council for Major Sirr, the defendant in this action. Gentlemen of the Jury, I would have been the last man, that would have been called upon as Council for the defendant, had he been that man as has been represented to you. This action is brought to recover the enormous sum of £5000; that sum my eloquent and ingenious friend Mr. Curran has told you is so trivial, that you ought to find the verdict to the full amount of the damages laid in the declaration; he has in this statement mentioned many things that are totally irrevelent to the present case. He has lamented that the damages were not laid at £10,000.

£10,000. He has attributed the conduct of my client to the plaintiff, as if malice was prevailing in his mind, againſt the plaintiff; ſuch an aſſertion is not capable of being given in a proof on an action for an aſſault; but malice had no ſhare in the tranſaction; we cannot give in evidence the intentions of a man; no; to harbour a malicious intention would degrade the dignity of human nature. He was incapable of feeling reſentment againſt the plaintiff. The defendant did know, that there had been the ſentence of tranſportation awarded by a court-martial, held at Kilkenny, againſt a man of the name of Hevey; but as to any knowledge the defendant had of him, he was ignorant as he is of a man in South America. Mr. Sirr was informed, in the coffee-room of the Commercial Buildings, that ſuch a man ſitting there, was of the name of Hevey; and recollecting there was a man of that name tried at Kilkenny; he did, after ſome little converſation, aſk him was he not once in the Provoſt Marſhalſea, and had he not been tried and found guilty at Kilkenny; and aſked him to ſhew his protection; and to account why he was found at large; Hevey refuſed to give defendent any ſatisfactory anſwer; and then Mr. Sirr told him, if he did not, he muſt arreſt him till he found out the truth; and for this conduct of the defendant, the plaintiff now applies to you, Gentlemen of the Jury, to be recompenſed in damages to the amount of £5000. I ſhall not, Gentlemen, attempt to diſplay that profuſion of eloquence, you have heard from my ingenious and learned friend; but I will ſtate the facts that will appear in evidence, on behalf of the defendant, my client in this caſe; and you will conſider, what injury the defendant has ſuſtained; before you on your oaths would find a verdict to the amount of the enormous ſum of £5000. You will conſider the evidences which have, and thoſe that will be, produced to you. There have been many circumſtances mentioned in the ſtatement of plaintiff's caſe, by his ingenious advocate, that are incapable of being given in evidence. You may therefore venture to put out of your minds three-fourths of the ſtatement, there being as I have already mentioned, many circumſtances ſtated, that could not be ſent up to you for your inveſtigation and conſideration. We ſhall produce evidence to prove facts of a public nature—as to common-fame, it is no foundation to ſtate to Gentlemen of your underſtandings, any facts grounded on reports of common-fame—I muſt obſerve to you Gentlemen, that my learned friend has ſtated to you, that the Liberty of this Country, was in danger of being deſtroyed; as if Liberty was only to be found within theſe walls;—but I truſt this repreſentation is not the caſe, for Liberty exiſts in every part of Ireland, as well as within theſe walls, and the Liberty of the Preſs is preſerved inviolable, and I doubt not but you may read, in ſome of the News-papers that may be publiſhed in a few day's, that there was on ſuch a day, a Trial wherein Mr. Hevey was plaintiff, and Mr. Sirr defendant, on an action for an aſſault, and falſe impriſonment, when Mr. Curran diſplayed his uſual great abilities, on behalf of his client, with amazing eloquence and energy, and the witneſſes were produced, to prove the facts ſtated by the learned Council, when it appeared, the Jury did not give credit to their teſtimony, for they found a verdict in favour of the defendant; peradventure ſuch a paragraph may appear in the Public News-papers; for I have no doubt, but that you will find your verdict in favour of my client; and againſt the plaintiff in this action. I ſhall not, Gentlemen of the Jury, ſtate any thing on the part of my client, Mr. Sirr, that will not be proved in evidence; it appears that the defendant accidentally went into the coffee-houſe of the Commercial Buildings, with ſome other Gentlemen, they ſat down and took coffee, and there happened to be ſitting in the ſame coffee-room, the plaintiff in this action, and ſome perſon having ſaid, you live ſir a good deal in the country where perſons live who were accuſed of being active in the late Rebellion; to which Mr. Sirr replied, I am not in the leaſt afraid of any of them. It was then pointed out, that there was a man in the room of the name of Hevey, who had been charged and tried on an accuſation of that nature, and had been ſentenced to tranſportation; to which Mr. Sirr, in a low voice made anſwer, "he deſerved to be hanged," and then ſome buſy intermeddling officious perſon, went to Hevey and told him what Mr. Sirr in a low voice had ſaid; and then the converſation took place which will be given in Evidence—I demand to ſee your protection; you know me—yes ſaid plaintiff, I know you are Major Sirr; but would give him no anſwer, as to

ſhewing how he became at large; and when Mr. Sirr brought him to his Office, in the Caſtle-yard, he again aſked him, to ſhew his protection; and then plaintiff in a ſwaggering bluſtering manner ſaid; "as to my protection go aſk your "betters for it." Now if Mr. Hevey had thought proper of telling Mr. Sirr, true it is, I was tried at Kilkenny, and was found guilty, and was ſentenced to tranſportation, but I have been by Lord Cornwallis, ſet at Liberty;—if Mr. Hevey had mentioned thoſe words to Mr. Sirr, you never would have heard of this action. See Gentlemen the evidence, that has been given on the part of the plaintiff, in ſupport of this action; the firſt witneſs was Mr. Molloy—the ſecond was Mr. Rainey—and the third witneſs was Mr. Maguire. Here the learned Council on the part of the defendant, with great accuracy and perſpicuity, recapitulated the teſtimony that thoſe three Gentlemen had given, on their direct and croſs examination; which the reader will ſee ſet out in hic verba in the foregoing part of this Report; therefore deemed unneceſſary to repeat it. It does appear, that in the courſe of the converſation, Mr. Sirr did aſk Hevey to ſhew his protection; if any he had, which Hevey refuſed to do, and the ſaid witneſſes ſaid, that Mr. Sirr did ſay to Hevey, "you deſerve to be hanged," and Hevey anſwered "you lie, you are a liar." This is not the caſe of an ordinary perſon; here was a man that had been accuſed of High Treaſon, to the defendant's own knowledge, he had been tried for that offence, and had been convicted; and he afterwards appeared at large; and defendant ſeeing him at large, aſked him to ſhew his certificate of a pardon; or ſaid he, I muſt detain you till I inveſtigate, whether you ever received a pardon or not, and on Hevey ſtill refuſing to give the defendant any ſatisfactory anſwer, he did hold him in cuſtody, as one of his Majeſty's ſubjects, he had a right to do; if ſuch man had been charged with High Treaſon, and refuſed to give an account how he came to be at large. A private individual may ſeize a perſon charged with High Treaſon, and bring him before a Magiſtrate; it has appeared in evidence, that it was a matter of public notoriety, that the defendant was a Magiſtrate, and had been very active in the apprehenſion of a great number of perſons charged with High Treaſon, at the time of the late Rebellion; and this country owes much of its preſent tranquillity, to the very great exertions and laudable efforts of the defendant, to crush that Rebellion, Mr. Sirr appears not to be negligent of his duty, he knew that a man of the name of Hevey had been in 1798, accused of High Treason, and seeing a man of that name pointed out to him in the commercial coffee-house, asked Mr. Hevey was you not in the Provost Prison, and was you not tried and convicted of High Treason; shew me by what authority, you are at large; how easy was it, for Mr. Hevey to say, I am that person; and since the Trial was had, Lord Cornwallis has given me a free pardon. Gentlemen of the Jury, you will judge of this case, merely upon the evidences adduced to you, and not from any statement of the Council, on one side or on the other; I am sure, you must have it in your recollection, the mild and lenient Government of this country, under the administration of the Marquis Cornwallis; he did think proper in mercy to reverse the sentence of several Courts-martial, where persons charged with High Treason were found guilty; he liberated from death many persons, and surely a man so liberated, could easily have said, "I have been pardoned through the clemency of the Marquis Cornwallis," and therefore the sentence of the Court-martial was not carried into execution; and thus Mr. Hevey would have been cleared from any stigma whatsoever.—It will appear most clearly in evidence, that the arresting of Hevey by Mr. Sirr, in the commercial coffee-house was not through wantonness, or maliciousness—Mr. Hevey has been since enlarged, and that also appears to be the fact. The plaintiff has not attempted by a single sintillo of evidence to say, he was arrested wantonly or maliciously. You are to presume, that the Government of this country acted wisely, and mercifully in pardoning many persons who had been found guilty by Court's-martial, of High Treason—you have no evidence, on which you can infer, that Mr. Sirr arrested Mr. Hevey out of malice; or for the gratification of any purpose of his own. The learned Judge who now tries the cause, will correct me, in point of law, in any matter in which I may mistake;—but, I hold the law to be, that a Magistrate does not do his duty, as such, who, if told a man charged with High Treason, and convicted, is seen at large, does not enquire why he appears at large. Gentlemen of the Jury, it is a matter of notoriety,

notoriety that Mr. Sirr was an active Magistrate during the time of the late Rebellion; and by his exertions in apprehending rebels, he did essentially contribute to save this commercial country, from scenes of blood. You cannot presume that Mr. Sirr knew the fact, that Lord Cornwallis had pardoned Hevey; and yet knowing that fact he apprehended Hevey out of malice. You are not intitled to make such a presumption; for the law will not permit you so to do—this man did stand his trial on a charge of High Treason; and the Court-martial found him guilty; that was a fact, known to defendant—he was afterwards pardoned, that was a fact that was then not known to defendant—and therefore he asked Hevey had he a protection, and if he had, to produce it. At the time of the Rebellion, the trial by Court's-martial, of persons accused of Treason, was expedient and it was judged so, by the Legislature; to suppress the Rebellion, there was at that time particular duties entrusted to particular persons; and in the exercise of a particular duty, several matters came under the discretion of the person in discharge of that duty; and the law will presume a Magistrate acts uprightly, unless the contrary is proved. Persons employed in the exercise of a perticular duty, may from proper, fair and laudable motives enquire of a man whom he knew was convicted by a Court-martial, why he appears at large; the man could easily have said, I have received a pardon from Lord Cornwallis. Would you not give a man credit for making such an enquiry? A man may have been charged with Treason in 1798, he may have been tried; the evidences may have been mistaken in the man, he may by mistake, be found guilty; but when the proceedings of a Court-martial were laid before the Lord Lieutenant, he may set aside the sentence, and liberate the man; as not being a man active in the Rebellion; although charged with being so; for a person is persumed innocent, until the contrary appears.

Gentlemen of the Jury, let me ask you, what evidence has there been laid before you, sufficient for you on your oaths to find, that Mr. Sirr acted from malicious motives towards the prisoner?—it is, for the searcher of all hearts alone, to investigate the motives of human actions.—In the present case, however, it appears to be developed by the man himself, you have evidence under his own hand, that he had been charged with the crime of High Treaſon, and was found guilty; and received afterwards his pardon through the clemency of the late Lord Lieutenant. It does not appear, that Mr. Sirr had any malice towards him; he met him accidentally in the coffee-room; he took him to his office in the caſtle-yard, and aſked him his name and reſidence; and then ſaid, as you were tried and convicted, ſhew me your protection, if you have one; but Hevey inſtead of producing the certificate to Mr. Sirr, or directing him where he could ſee it, bid him aſk his betters for it. As to the plaintiff having a favourite mare, taken from him by any perſon, no evidence of it has been given; and therefore I do not know what foundation there was, to introduce any thing about her in this caſe. Let me aſk you, on what ground is my client to be deprived of the common benefit in this caſe? are you to ſuppoſe there was malice in Mr. Sirr's mind againſt the plaintiff. By the general law of the land, you cannot impute malice unleſs proved; and the evidence is totally ſilent, as to the charge of malice.—On what ground then, are you to find a verdict for the enormous damages of £5000?—By the general rule of evidence, every man ſhall be deemed innocent, until the contrary appears; my client therefore ſhall have the benefit of the law, which every other man has. As to what has been given in evidence, reſpecting Mr. Sandy's conduct to Hevey, my client is not called upon to anſwer for the conduct of Mr. Sandys; Mr. Sirr is only accountable for his own conduct; I am not vindicating Mr. Sandys, the plaintiff is at liberty to bring an action againſt Mr. Sandys, if he thinks proper. It appears that Mr. Sandys is the keeper of the priſon, called the provoſt, a priſon appropriated for the ſafe cuſtody of perſons charged with the crime of High Treaſon. In the period of 1798, Mr. Hevey was charged with the crime of High Treaſon, and he was brought to the Royal Exchange in cuſtody, and from thence taken to the provoſt—he was brought to trial, convicted and afterwards pardoned. I ſee no ground on which the learned Gentleman who preceded, beſtowed the phillipic on the Government of this country—we have the ſame liberty remaining among us, we ever had. In the year 1798, this country was infected with a hoard of vipers, who were guilty of rebellious practices, againſt the liberty and welfare of their own country. The liberty of this country, and the peace of this country is now reſtored. The liberty of the preſs is as much revered and eſteemed now as in any age whatſoever; you will no doubt ſee in the news-paper, for the preſs is not ſilent, a paragraph, ſtating, that this day a caſe was tried, of Hevey verſus Sirr; in which caſe Mr. Curran appeared of council for the plaintiff, and in the moſt eloquent ſpeech we ever remember to have heard, made ſome ſtrictures on the Government of this country, in very ſtrong terms, and repreſented that the defendant ought to be aſſeſſed in very heavy damages; we have only to lament that the Jury was not of that learned councils opinion, for they found a verdict againſt his client.

In truth, Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to decide this caſe upon the evidences; Mr. Maguire has told you what paſſed in the priſon of the provoſt; but it was the other two witneſſes, who gave evidence of the arreſt of Mr. Hevey in the Commercial Buildings. As to Mr. Hevey being put into the room where perſons were lying ill with infectious diſorders, and where it appeared a man was lying ſo ill, that he ſaw a perſon reading prayers by him, as the witneſs believed —if Mr. Hevey was put into ſuch a room, that is to be imputed to Mr. Sandys, and not to Mr. Sirr; for my client had nothing to do with it. Mr. Sirr was not the keeper of that priſon; there is no charge that Mr. Sirr put the plaintiff into that room; for the actions of Mr. Sandys, my client is not anſwerable. Mr. Maguire did tell you he had long been intimate with plaintiff, and then Mr. Hevey did ſign the apology to Mr. Sirr, which has been read in evidence. If any thing was done improperly to Mr. Hevey when in the provoſt, why does not Mr. Hevey proſecute Mr. Sandys for it? why did he not bring his action againſt Mr. Sandys, and not make that a charge, to increaſe the damages as againſt Mr. Sirr!—As to what paſſed in the Commercial Buildings, I muſt obſerve that Mr. Sirr was well known to be a public Magiſtrate; he it was, who was inſulted in the execution of his office by Mr. Hevey—that is an indictable offence of common law. Mr. Hevey has now thought fit to bring an action of damages againſt my client, becauſe Hevey who had been found guilty, by a Court Martial, appeared at large, without aſſigning any reaſon, when aſked by the defendant, why the ſentence of the Court Martial had not been put in execution againſt the plaintiff.—The plaintiff after abuſing the defendant in the manner the witneſs has told you, now calls on

on you, Gentlemen of the Jury, to give him a verdict of £5000 damages. You are not prepared to say what evidence appeared before the Court Martial on the trial; but you are prepared to say, that the Lord Lieutenant was invested with the power of reversing the sentence of the Court Martial, and pardoning the prisoner of any crime committed by him. We do know that Courts Martial were invested with power to try persons accused of High Treason—the Courts Martial were invested with that power, by the Government of this country, and by the act of the Legislature passed in 1798; such was then the unhappy turbulence of the times, as rendered it necessary, in order to crush the rebellion. Hevey was found guilty by a Court Martial, he was afterwards pardoned; and he is now to be considered as innocent. We must, however presume, the sentenced passed by the Court Martial was right, according to the evidences which then appeared before that Court, although it was not signed by the Lord Lieutenant, who did not think proper to carry the sentence into effect. But let me ask you, Gentlemen of the Jury, is Mr. Hevey now to be considered as an injured man, to soften this impression on your minds, that he had not committed any offence. It has been said by my learned friend, you will judge what degree of criminality attached upon Mr. Sirr, for committing the assault and false imprisonment laid in the declaration. But Gentlemen of the Jury, you will be told by the noble and learned Judge, who presides on this trial, what the law in this case is, and as to the facts, you will judge from the evidences, whether you on your oaths can be justified, in finding a verdict against Mr. Sirr. The notoriety of Mr. Sirr's exertions to crush the late rebellion, has been noticed, with more than trumpet tongues; it is notorious he did exert himself to find out and apprehend those who in the time of the rebellion, met for the worst of purposes. Do you think that Mr. Hevey has deserved credit for his conduct, and therefore merits that you should give him the excessive damages of £5000? It is because the sentence of the Court Martial has not been carried into execution against him, that therefore you are to give him the enormous damages of £5000?—The act of amnesty did protect persons of his description, for it must now be taken for granted, that he had been once a traitor, and a double traitor, because he as a Yeoman, at the very instant inſtant he was charged with the crime of High Treaſon. It muſt ever be remembered with gratitude, that it was by the exertions of the Yeomanry of Ireland, the late rebellion has been cruſhed. If your Lordſhip thinks, that in point of Law, there ought to be any verdict againſt the defendant, then, Gentlemen of the Jury, you will judge whether the damages ought to be to any amount; or only nominal, as 6d. damages. We will go into evidence, on the part of the defendant, and it is with confidence, I commit my client's caſe to your conſideration.

William Plunkett, Eſq.—Call John Goulding.—We call him to ſhew, that the plaintiff Hevey was a Yeoman, and that he being then in the year 1798 a Yeoman, was charged notwithſtanding, with being active in the rebellion, and was liable to be apprehended, and tried on that charge.

Lord Kilwarden—If Mr. Sirr had a reaſonable ground to ſuſpect a man guilty of treaſon, he ought in point of Law, to carry the man before a Magiſtrate.—Did Mr. Sirr do ſo—is that the ground of your defence?

Council for Plaintiff—We do not admit that Mr. Hevey had been a Yeoman.

MR. HALL, ſworn.

Q. Do you know Mr. Sirr?

A. I do.

Q. Do you know Mr. Hevey?

A. Yes; the firſt time I ſaw him was on the night of the 8th of September laſt, at the commercial coffee-houſe. I was there, at the beginning of this buſineſs.

Q. What paſſed?

A. I was in the coffee-room, and Mr. Sirr came in and he ſat down, and talked on different ſubjects; but particularly about a houſe he had lately taken at the foot of the mountains; and I told him I was ſurpriſed he would take a place there, as the boys might pay him a viſit.—He replied, "He was not afraid of rebels in any place; and there is one of them," looking over at Mr. Hevey, who was at another table; Mr. Sirr ſpoke in ſo low a voice, as ſcarcely to be heard, Mr. Hevey then came up, and ſaid to Mr. Sirr, "you ought to be hanged;" meaning the Major—Major Sirr then ſaid, "were you not confined in the provoſt?"—Hevey ſaid, ſaid, " many better man than either you or I was ſo; and I ſay, you ought to be hanged."—Major Sirr then repeated that Hevey ought to be hanged—then Hevey ſaid to Mr. Sirr, aſſign your reaſon, I defy you; I think you ought to be hanged."—The Major then ſaid, " I dare ſay you and your party think ſo; and Hevey ſaid then to Mr. Sirr," " You are a liar, I am of no party"—and Major Sirr aſked where he lived, and Hevey then ſaid, he lived in Thomas-court.

Q. Did any thing elſe paſs relative to any trial?

A. Not at that time.

Q. Did you ſee any thing elſe paſs.

A. Mr. Sirr ſaid to Hevey, ſhew me how you got out of the Provoſt—Mr. Sirr then took Hevey down, the Caſtle-yard—they walked down ſtreet arm in arm; I followed them to the Caſtle-yard. Hevey refuſed to give Mr. Sirr any account, but ſaid, he would go with Mr. Sirr where he pleaſed.

Q. Was he handcuffed.

A. No, I followed them to Mr. Sirr's Office in the lower Caſtle-yard—Mr. Sirr there ſat down in a chair, and aſked Hevey, is your name John Hevey; Mr. Hevey ſaid it was; Mr. Sirr then aſked him where do you live, Mr: Hevey anſwered in Thomas-court; Mr. Sirr then aſked him, was you ever tried at Kilkenny—Mr. Hevey anſwered, he was; then ſaid Mr. Sirr, ſhew me how you came to be at large, or will commit you to the Provoſt. Mr. Hevey then ſaid to Mr. Sirr, go aſk your betters. Mr. Hevey would not anſwer Mr. Sirr any queſtions whatſoever; Mr. Hevey was then taken to the Provoſt; Mr. Sirr ſaid to Mr. Hevey, I ſuppoſe you could give me ſome anſwer. Mr. Sirr frequently aſked Mr. Hevey to give him ſome account, Mr. Hevey bid Mr. Sirr to aſk his betters, and then ſaid, he would anſwer no queſtion whatſoever. I then went and addreſſed Mr Hevey, and begged him to ſatisfy Major Sirr, and if he had not his protection about him, that I would go with pleaſure to get it for him; or would call on any friend to come to him, ſo as to get him out of his ſituation; he refuſed my interference; Major Sirr then went over to his deſk and took out ſome paper, and Hevey was ſent by a guard of ſoldiers to the Provoſt—Mr. Hevey was not handcuffed; Mr. Sirr remained behind with me.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CURRAN.

Q. You was talking in the commercial coffee-houſe with Mr. Sirr about his country houſe?

A. Yes.

Q. I ſuppoſe it is a very fine houſe, no doubt.

A. Why I cannot ſay, I have never ſeen the inſide.

Q. You won't be long ſo Mr. Hall, you'll ſoon receive a card of invitation—what profeſſion are you.

A. I am an Attorney.

Q. Are you not in the office of Mr. Heppenſtal.

A. I am.

Q. Are you not a clerk to Mr. Heppenſtal.

A. I am, but I have ſome private property.

Q. I ſee you are a gentleman of good ſenſe—had Mr. Sirr an idea at firſt of arreſting Mr. Hevey.

A. I ſuppoſe he had no idea of taking Mr. Hevey into cuſtody; he would not deſcend to take Mr. Hevey into cuſtody; for he did not know Hevey or he would not have aſked him his name; if he had known Hevey he might have taken him at the time he ſtood up to him—Mr. Sirr ſaid he did not know he was the man, this forms a reaſonable belief, that he had no intention of arreſting him for Mr. Sirr did not appear to have known Mr. Hevey when he firſt ſaw him in the coffee-room.

Q. Your evidence is, that you believe Mr. Sirr did not know Mr. Hevey, and therefore you believe that Mr. Sirr did not intend to take Mr. Hevey into cuſtody.

A. Yes, he knew the man when he ſaid his name was Hevey; and becauſe he ſaid, he had been tried at Kilkenny.

Q. Do you believe he gave any authority, and why he committed Mr. Hevey to the Provoſt.

A. Mr. Sirr did write ſome paper and delivered it to the guard, who went with Mr. Hevey to the Provoſt.

Q. Do you believe it was under the authority of Mr. Sirr, that Mr. Hevey was committed.

A. Moſt undoubtedly.

Q. Was there an application to General Craigh made for a warrant.

A. There was no time for ſuch application by the Major until the committal—I do not believe Mr. Hevey was ſent to the Priſon under the authority of General Craigh; I do believe Mr. Hevey was ſent to priſon, without the knowledge of General Craigh at that time.

Q. Do you believe he was committed to the provoſt by Mr. Sirr?

A. I do.

Q. Do you believe that Mr. Hevey had been living in the City of Dublin for ſome time; and carried on the buſineſs of a Brewer?

A. I do not know, I cannot form a belief.

Q. Did you ſee the ſentence of the Court Martial at Kilkenny?

A. I ſaw a copy of the ſentence of the Court Martial, but not the original.

Q. Do you believe Mr. Hevey was ſet at liberty by the Lord Lieutenant.

A. I do believe it.

Q. What is your reaſon for believing it?

A. I ſaw Mr Hevey at his liberty.

Q. Was Hevey diſcharged by the Lord Lieutenant?

A. It was ſo mentioned in the copy I ſaw; Hevey not being active in the rebellion.

Q. What was the Court Martial's opinion of Hevey's criminality?

A. I cannot anſwer that.

Q. Do you make a defence for Mr. Sirr?

A. I am ſure I do not.

Q. Was Mr. Hevey enlarged on giving ſecurity?

A. I ſhould ſuppoſe ſo; I cannot form a belief about it.

Q. Do you believe he was ſerious in the apology he made to Mr. Sirr?

A. I heard in court this day, that Mr. Sirr had refuſed to accept of any apology.

Q. Do you know Mr. Sandys?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you believe he is in court?

A. I believe ſo.

Q. Upon the whole of this tranſaction, had Hevey a reſentment to Mr. Sirr?

A. From the contents of the apology I ſhould ſuppoſe not.

Lord Kilwarden.—This Gentleman ſays, that Mr. Hevey was ſet at liberty, and that Mr. Sirr refuſed to accept the apology.

Q. Was

Q. Was the certificate ſent to Mr. Sandys, to diſcharge Mr. Hevey?

A. I ſuppoſe it was lodged with Mr. Sandys or he could have no power to diſcharge him.

Q. Mr. Sirr muſt have known it?

A. I believe he muſt have heard it.

Q. What brought you to Mr. Sirr's office?

A. I went merely out of curioſity.

Q. You believe that Mr. Hevey has been diſcharged regularly.

A. Mr. Sirr muſt have believed it as well as me.

Q. Do you believe that Mr. Sirr knew at the time of the arreſt, that Mr. Hevey had been regularly diſcharged?

A I believe he might not then have known it?

Q. Do you believe that was the caſe?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you ſee the original order by the Lord Lieutenant, to diſcharge Mr. Hevey?

A. I ſaw a copy of it.

Q. When was Mr. Hevey tried at Kilkenny?

A. In 1798.

Q. How long did he remain in priſon?

A. I do not know how long.

Q. Did not the Lord Lieutenant go into the country, and there releaſe many priſoners?

A. He ſurely did.

Q. Had priſoners diſcharged any protections given them?

A. Almoſt all the rebels who were diſcharged, had protections; I ſuppoſe ſo.

Caſe reſt on the part of the defendant.

Mr. Plunkett.—Mr. Hevey had been brought up before Mr. Juſtice Chamberlaine, and the return was, that he had been arreſted by the authority of General Craigh.

WILLIAM PLUNKET, Esq.

MY LORD, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY,

In this caſe I am Council for Major Sirr. This is an action brought by plaintiff, for arreſting him in the coffee-houſe of the Commercial Buildings.—I was in hopes it would not have been neceſſary for me to addreſs you; had it not been that my learned friend, Mr. Barrington., mentioned his intention of addreſſing you on the part of his client; it therefore becomes my duty to offer a few words to you on the part of Major Sirr. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an action brought by Mr. Hevey the plaintiff, for an Aſſault and falſe Impriſonment, and the plaintiff has laid his damages at the enormous ſum of £5000, and the plaintiff requires you upon your oaths to find a verdict to that amount, as a compenſation for the injury he alledges to have ſuſtained. Let me aſk why is this exceſſive damages demanded? It is in order to ſhew to the inhabitants of our Siſter Kingdom that we were abſolute ſlaves; I do believe we enjoy the bleſſings of Liberty here, as much as in our Siſter Kingdom, notwithſtanding what has been ſaid by my learned friend. I differ from my learned friend, who adviſed you to find a verdict for £5000, for if you ſhould find your verdict againſt my client, you will no doubt find a verdict with very ſmall damages. I know you will be addreſſed by my learned friend who follows me, but if he confines himſelf to the naked queſtion in this caſe, his argument cannot take up much time; he has been lately in the habit of addreſſing himſelf to the citizens of Dublin, and he is anxious that the real ſentiments of his mind ſhall be known to them.

Gentlemen of the Jury, one ground on which you have been called upon, to give a verdict of ſuch large damages to the plaintiff is, that ſaid Hevey was impriſoned through the malice of the defendant; let us examine whether in truth there was any malicious motive which induced the tranſaction, which has given riſe to this action for damages. Mr. Hevey as has been ſtated to you, has been held by his fellow-citizens in the moſt reſpectable light, and that he was happy in enjoying the good eſteem and ſociety of the principal traders in this metropolis. Gentlemen, it has appeared in evidence, that in 1798 Mr. Hevey was a Yeoman. He appeared then as one of thoſe gallant Volunteers, who in the hour of peril and danger boldly ſtepped forward to cruſh the Rebellion; it was to the efforts of the Volunteers we now enjoy our tranquillity; we relied on the protection of the Yeomanry of Ireland for its defence—upon the faith of the loyalty of the Yeomanry we placed the greateſt confidence. Mr. Hevey was in 1798 a Yeoman, he appeared in the uniform of thoſe Illuſtrious Bands; he muſt as ſuch, have taken the oaths of Allegiance, ance, and other oaths as a Yeoman, to do the duty his ſtation required. The loyalty of the Yeomanry of Ireland obtained the approbation of Government. The loyalty of Mr. Hevey was however doubted, notwithſtanding he did appear as a Yeoman, in uniform. There was a charge exhibited againſt him, of being active in the Rebellion, although he had taken the oath of Allegiance, and that he was a Rebel; he was thereupon apprehended on the charge of High Treaſon, and he was brought up a priſoner to the Royal Exchange, from thence he was committed a priſoner to the Provoſt, and thence ſent to Kilkenny, where he was tried and found guilty, by a Court-martial; and received ſentence to be tranſported for ſeven years, which ſentence Lord Cornwallis was pleaſed to revoke. But Gentlemen of the Jury, he was found guilty by the Court martial, and you can have now not any doubt of the fact; you have no foundation now to ſay he was then innocent, for the Court-martial found him guilty of High Treaſon; he had broken the oath of Allegiance, which as a Yeoman he had taken. The lenity of Government did extend to him, and the ſentence of tranſportation againſt him was reverſed, and he was enlarged, having given ſecurity for his keeping the peace. Now Gentlemen of the Jury, it was under theſe circumſtances he was enlarged; and he appeared at large, but whether he got a licence to impower him to be at large, does not appear in evidence. Mr. Sirr was a Magiſtrate to whoſe meritorious ſervices, this nation is highly indebted for its preſervation; he was a gentleman by whoſe exertions many perſons accuſed of High Treaſon, were apprehended. Mr. Sirr had no perſonal knowledge of the plaintiff before the night of the 8th of September, and he had no previous malice againſt him; there was not an atom of malice on the part of Mr. Sirr. On the night of the 8th of September Mr. Sirr was ſitting in the Commercial coffee-room with ſome gentlemen, and a perſon came into the coffee-room whom Mr. Sirr was told was of the name of Hevey, Mr. Sirr recollected there was a man of that name, who had in 1798 been tried at Kilkenny, and had been ſentenced to tranſportation, he therefore conceived it proper to enquire, why he appeared at large; and after ſome little converſation, Mr. Sirr aſked Mr. Hevey to ſhew him his protection; Mr. Hevey in a bluſtering ſwaggering manner, thought proper per to refuſe to give him any ſatisfactory anſwer; then ſaid Mr. Sirr, if you do not give me a ſatisfactory anſwer as to that point, I muſt arreſt you till the truth is enquired into. If you have a protection tell me where I can ſee it; Mr. Hevey did tell Mr. Sirr at his office, he might go and aſk his betters for it. There was a perſon of the name of Maguire (but not the Mr. Maguire who was produced as a witneſs on this Table) who had been tried on a charge of High Treaſon, when a witneſs who appeared on the part of the proſecution, was as alledged by Mr. Hevey a perſon of infamous character; and Hevey gave evidence of it; and that Maguire it appears was acquitted. But let me aſk, is that tranſaction any ground for you Gentlemen of the Jury, to believe that there was any malice in the mind of Mr. Sirr againſt the plaintiff? but I ſhall not detain you on this part of the caſe. Gentlemen it is evident that there could not exiſt any malice in the mind of Mr. Sirr, previous to the 8th of September; now let us examine into the tranſactions which took place between plaintiff and defendant on that day. Mr. Sirr and a Gentleman with him, was ſitting in the Commercial coffee-room, and the Gentleman ſaid to Mr. Sirr, your reſidence in the Country is amongſt many of thoſe who had been Rebels in 1798 live, and Mr. Sirr admitted it, but added theſe words, " he was not afraid of any of them;" Mr. Hevey happened accidentally to come into the coffee-room, and the gentleman ſaid to Mr. Sirr, there ſaid he, is one of them; a perſon who happened to ſit near the table where Mr. Sirr was ſitting, heard the converſation, and theſe words ſpoken, " he ought to be hanged;" although theſe words were ſpoken in a low voice. yet they were overheard, and ſome officious perſon told Hevey theſe words were ſaid; on which Hevey turned round, and went up to Mr. Sirr and aſked him, did he ſay theſe words; and then ſaid, you, meaning Mr. Sirr, ought to be hanged; you are a liar; theſe words of Mr. Hevey were heard by every perſon preſent, as the witneſs this day has told you. There has been evidence laid before you of the Aſſault and abuſive words given by Mr. Hevey to Mr. Sirr, and ſpoke in a ferocious manner, in a public coffee-room, where many perſons heard the altercation between theſe two perſons. Mr. Sirr aſked Mr. Hevey to ſhew him his protection, which Mr. Hevey refuſed to do, and then Mr. Sirr ſaid, he muſt detain detain him, till he ſhewed him, why he was ſeen at large; having been at Kilkenny, ſentenced to tranſportation for ſeven years;—Mr. Hevey did, inſtead of ſhewing his protection, ſay to Mr. Sirr, "You ought to be hanged—you are a liar." It has appeared in evidence, that Mr. Hevey was tried for High Treaſon, and was convicted, and was afterwards diſcharged by the Lord Lieutenant: Mr. Sirr had a right to aſk Mr. Hevey why he was ſeen at large, and he refuſing to give Mr. Sirr any ſatisfactory anſwer, Mr. Sirr did bring him to his office, in the lower Caſtle-yard, in order to enquire into the fact, whether Mr. Hevey had, or had not, any protection granted to him; or had been pardoned, after being by the Court Martial ſentenced to tranſportation for ſeven years. When Mr. Sirr did bring him to his office, he aſked him his name and reſidence, and whether he had, or had not, been tried at Kilkenny; he told Mr. Sirr that his name was Hevey, and his reſidence in Thomas-court, and acknowledged he had been tried at Kilkenny; but in anſwer to Mr. Sirr, about Mr. Hevey ſhewing him his protection, he ſaid, "Go aſk your Betters." On which, Mr. Sirr ſaid, I muſt commit you to Gaol, until that matter is enquired into.

Now, Gentlemen of the Jury, this is the caſe of the plaintiff, who now brings this action, ſeeking for redreſs, for the injury he has received, and he brings his action of damages. to the enormous amount of £5000; who, if he had told Mr. Sirr, when aſked by him, had he a protection, and have then ſaid, I have been pardoned by Lord Cornwallis; there would have been an end of the buſineſs. It has been ſaid, that Mr. Hevey was committed to the provoſt priſon, and that he was loaded with manacles; there has not been an atom of evidence given, that any kind of manacles whatſoever, was put on Mr. Hevey.

Gentlemen of the Jury, as to what happened to Mr. Hevey, after he was put into the provoſt, in the cuſtody of Mr. Sandys, certainly Mr. Sirr has nothing to ſay to; for the conduct of Mr. Sandys, is not to be viſited upon my client. The next day Mr. Sandys told Mr. Hevey, if he would make an apology to Mr. Sirr, he would endeavour to get him diſcharged.—Mr. Hevey refuſed to make any apology, and ſaid, he would appeal to the Law; he was thereupon brought before Mr. Juſtice Chamberlaine, who was pleaſed pleaſed to remand him to priſon; as it appeared he was in cuſtody, under a charge from General Craigh; after this Mr. Hevey ſaid, he would ſign an apology; but Mr. Sirr ſaid, I do not want any apology, but as Mr. Hevey appeals to the Law, I will go to Mr. Abbot, and endeavour to get the man diſcharged; and it appears that he has been ſince, that is, the 11th of September, at 12 o'clock diſcharged. I do conceive the law to be, that Mr. Sirr was bound by his duty, to enquire of a man whom he ſaw at large, after he had been ſentenced to tranſportation, why the ſentence was not carried into execution; and to detain him a reaſonable time, until that fact was enquired into.—I do ſay he muſt, however, have a reaſonable ground of ſuſpicion for detaining him; in this caſe it is admitted that Mr. Sirr did know, that a man of the name of Hevey, had been tried at Kilkenny, and had been found guilty, and received ſentence of tranſportation; and afterwards being pointed out to him, ſeeing him at large, he did enquire of him, why the ſentence was not carried into execution; and though it was very eaſy for Mr. Hevey to have told Mr. Sirr, that he had received a pardon, he refuſed to give any ſatisfactory anſwer to Mr. Sirr. By the terms of the amneſty act, Mr. Hevey was called upon to produce his diſcharge, and ſhew that he was diſcharged by due courſe of law; he might have ſaid, I have a certificate of it—if Mr. Hevey had ſaid that to Mr. Sirr, he would have been immediately diſcharged. In this caſe, Mr. Sirr had a reaſonable ground for ſuſpicion of Mr. Hevey, that is not denyed;—but as ſoon as Mr. Sirr had about the 11th of September, diſcovered that Mr. Hevey had received a pardon from Lord Cornwallis, when Lord Lieutenant, Mr. Sirr immediately went to Mr. Abbot, and obtained from him a diſcharge of this man from the provoſt. This therefore is a good defence, on the part of my client, under the direction of the court, in point of law, to induce you, Gentlemen of the Jury, to find your verdict in favour of my client; but ſhould you, Gentlemen, find a verdict for the plaintiff, the next point that comes under conſideration is, whether you would only find nominal, or perhaps 6d. damages. But it is for you, Gentlemen, to aſcertain the quantum of damages; it is for you to take into your conſideration, the circumſtances of the parties; it has appeared to you in evidence, that Mr. Hevey, although he was found by the Court Martial guilty, he was ſince pardoned; through the lenity and humanity of Government. As to Mr. Hevey's preſent ſituation, he is now a priſoner in Newgate. You are now upon your oaths to ſay, what injury this man hath ſuſtained; and to ſay whether or no, you will give him any more than nominal damages.

Now, Gentlemen of the Jury, it is for you to conſider what has been the conduct of Mr. Sirr, that he ſhould be the Gentleman, who ſhould have vindictive damages awarded againſt him; for what hath this Gentleman done, he has merely acted in diſcharge of his duty, in the manner the witneſſes has told you—he hath for ſome years taken a moſt active part in apprehending traitors, and in ſuppreſſing the late Rebellion; and prevented thereby, the then threatened invaſion of this country. His conduct has been in the higheſt degree praiſe worthy; and until the tranſaction happened, which hath been the ſubject of this preſent action, no imputation whatſoever, could ever be attached to him for any part of his conduct, either public or private. You cannot therefore Gentlemen, but conſider the conduct of Mr. Sirr, but as acting in the honeſt exerciſe of his duty. Give me leave to refer to your conſideration, the periods of 1798 and 1799, when the exertions of Mr. Sirr, contributed very eſſentially to the ſuppreſſion of the Rebellion;—I ſhall only add, are thoſe public ſervices to have no weight in your mind; that you, by your verdict, would not protect him from the vindictive claim of the plaintiff, who has brought this action, and laid his damages, at the great ſum of £5000. But I have no doubt, your verdict will be ſuch, as will meet the juſtice of this caſe.

JONAH BARRINGTON, Esq.

MY LORD, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY,

In this caſe, I am Council on behalf of the plaintiff, Mr. Hevey—I feel it an indiſpenſible duty to ſpeak to this caſe, as I conceive it to be one of the greateſt importance, not only to the plaintiff, but to the crown and to the country. The plaintiff has brought his action to recover damages againſt the defendant, for a violation of the Law, and an aſſault upon the conſtitution. He has brought his caſe before you with confidence, and calls ſteadily for juſtice; not merely to vindicate his own character, or to avenge his own wrongs; not with the view of mercenary damages, or a malicious triumph; but he calls for juſtice againſt the public officer, who has abuſed the public truſt in his perſon; and in his perſon has endeavoured to convert the legal authority of the crown, into a deſpotic inſtrument for the ſubject. My learned friend, Mr. Plunkett, has declared ſincerely, his reluctance to ſpeak to evidence; I am convinced it proceeded from an honeſt conſciouſneſs of a bad cauſe; which blunts his ingenuity, and flattens his talents, when he is called forth as the reluctant advocate of tyranny or of oppreſſion. You have heard him unlike himſelf, ſpeaking a language foreign from his ſentiments. My learned and ingenious friend, feels that his eloquence and ingenuity, could be better applied, and more effectively exerciſed. The language and ſentiments he was neceſſarily obliged to uſe, he conceived would be no recommendation to the patriot feelings of that learned and ſpirited ſeminary, which it is his laudable ambition and wiſh to repreſent. And I am ſure, when that Gentleman came to examine into the defendant's caſe, he would have given up his brief with pleaſure.—I have no ſuch motive to decline ſpeaking to evidence, on the part of the plaintiff, and therefore I exerciſe my duty with pleaſure, as his advocate; and however impoſſible it is in me, to diſplay ſuch ſplendid talents, as my friend Mr. Curran, whoſe exertions every man muſt admire. Yet when the topic to be diſcuſſed, is the liberty of the ſubject, he muſt be a ſlaviſh advocate indeed, whoſe energy does not ariſe, in proportion to the importance of the diſcuſſion; and calls out whatever talents God and Nature gave him.

In this caſe, it is only neceſſary to ſtate the material facts proved, in order to convince an honeſt Jury of their bounden duty.—Theſe facts alone will teach you to form a juſt judgment, whether Ireland is to participate in the liberty of that country to which ſhe is now united; or to plunge back again into the chains and tramels of petty and deſpotic tyranny—that is the real queſtion. If you, Gentlemen of the Jury, by your verdict, ſtamp a juſtification on the conduct of Major Sirr, Ireland is in bondage; but if your verdict marks that conduct as unjuſtifiable and illegal, Ireland will regain some traces of the British Constitution; and the personal liberty of the subject may be secured and protected.

I know I now speak before an honest Jury, and a wise Judge—the eyes of Ireland are fixed on the event of this trial—not as to Hevey or as to Sirr, but as to freedom or as to slavery. For it is fully and unequivocally proved, that Mr. Hevey a subject in the King's Peace, against whom no public charge remained—and to whom no public crime was then imputed—and against whom no warrant existed—or any pretence of legal detention, was dragged from a public room in the noon day as a common felon, and plunged into an infectious dungeon, to enforce a private apology, to a private subject, for a private insult, contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, the law of the land, and the liberty of the Country.

Gentlemen of the Jury, could even the gliding shadow of distant Liberty, light one moment on a country, where such an act should be held justifiable. It is not a common assault, committed by an ordinary person, on an ordinary occasion, in the common occurrences of error or of violence; when the damage is measured by the private injury, and the wrongs of the individual are not identified with the general liberty of the Country. It is not the case of a false imprisonment of a person in the lower orders of life, by a person of the same description, where the hours of detention, measure the proportion of the injury; but it is a public and unwarrantable imprisonment of a respectable Brewer of the City of Dublin, by Major Sirr, to gratify the feelings of private passion, under the colour of public duty. The Major is a Gentleman, whom you all know, to whose merit as a public officer, I as freely subscribe, as any person who hears me. I admit he was active, indefatigable, and effective, in preserving the peace of this City, at the time this Country was in danger; but the Rebellion that did in 1798, agitate this kingdom is now past, and this Country is now in a state of tranquillity, and was fully so in 1801, when the defendant committed the offence before you. Defendant's Council have dwelt on the past services of the defendant, but Gentlemen, it is a principle foreign and unknown to our Constitution, that any person, on any authority, should claim a privilege to commit acts of injury and oppression, on his fellow-citizens, with impunity for past services; and for which he was so amply rewarded. It is unknown to the moderns—it was unknown to the ancients. The last of the Horatii, though he had saved his country, was condemned for the death of his sister;—Manlius was flung from the Tarpean Rock, though he defeated the designs of the Gauls, and saved the Capitol of Rome. Yet why should we have recurrence to the pages of Ancient History; we have a modern and recent example, and with which the Major is better acquainted, than the story of Horatii—I mean Jemmy O'Brien! he also defeated the machinations of the Gauls, was the saviour of his Country, and preserved our Capitol, yet Jemmy received the reward of past services, for he was hanged in this City for murder. His past services could not protect him from the law—he died, and the law triumphed!! It is a weak and insolent defence to say, that the defendant's services should warrant his offences—it is absurd to argue, that because Major Sirr knew and supported the law in 1798, he should be warranted in overturning his own fabrick, and be at liberty to break through both law and constitution in 1801. Because he defended the constitution in time of war, is he to destroy it in time of peace; and because a rebellion once existed, is a tyranny to be erected on its ruins. This argument of defendant's Council, admits my client's case, because if defendant's Council had a better argument, they would certainly have used it. But they had none, the law failed them, justice failed them, and they were obliged to have recourse to finese, and endeavour to lead away the minds of the Jury from the fact in issue, and impose upon their loyalty, when they could not mislead their reason; defendant's Council as another argument, have had recourse to another finese, equally weak, but more unwarrantable than the former; namely, that the plaintiff, Mr. Hevey, had been a rebel in 1798, and convicted, and sentenced to transportation; and that therefore a personal injury to him, by so meritorious a person as defendant, should weigh little with the Jury.—Monstrous assertion!—Even if Mr. Hevey had been guilty, which I deny, such a doctrine is most vicious. God forbid that when a subject receives a pardon, and is restored to the bosom of his country, he should remain an outlawed slave in the midst of a free people; on the contrary, Mr. Hevey was as much under the protection of the law, as Major Sirr, and both delicacy, and honour, and public policy, should rather have united in making a pardoned man forget that he had offended, offended, than in making that pardoned offence, a pretence for his oppreſſion. Such a pretence is an inſult to the throne, which pardoned, a charge againſt the lenity of the King, and a crime againſt the liberty of the ſubject; and of all the means which human ingenuity could deviſe, the moſt effectual means of perpetuating diſaffection. If ſuch a doctrine was permitted, pardon would only operate as prolonged puniſhment, and repeated injury excite to future diſobedience; the letter of the law, and the ſpirit of the conſtitution, reprobate ſo wicked, ſo weak, and ſo miſchievous a doctrine. But I deny the fact of Mr. Hevey's guilt: in times when it was enough to be ſuſpected, to warrant puniſhment, Mr. Hevey had enemies; he belonged to the perſecuted caſt, and was charged of courſe, with High Treaſon; the minds of all men were inflamed—rebellion raged—blood was familiar—animoſity was implacable, and Mr. Hevey was ſent to Kilkenny, to be tried by Court-martial, for High Treaſon; a reward was offered for any perſon who would give evidence againſt him; no creditable witneſs could be found—no High Treaſon could be proved, yet he was ſentenced to ſeven years tranſportation, on the charge or ſuſpicion of High Treaſon; though he muſt have ſuffered death if guilty. The proceedings of the Court-martial were laid before Lord Cornwallis, he conſidered them, and under his Sign Manual, gave the lie direct, to the minutes of that Court-martial; ordering Mr. Hevey to be diſcharged, in as much as it appeared, that he was not active in the Rebellion; and let down the ſentence eaſy, by directing Mr. Hevey to give ſecurity, which he immediately did. Mr. Hevey was diſcharged; he betook himſelf to his induſtry as a Brewer, a man of wealth, and never had any ſpecies of offence laid to his charge, till the defendant treated him like a common felon in the Commercial coffee-room; and by ſuch treatment, trampled on the juſtice and humanity of the abſent Viceroy. Where then lies the guilt of Mr. Hevey?—where then lies the juſtification of Major Sirr?—is it in the refuted minutes of the Kilkenny Court-martial—or is it in counteracting the royal lenity, or Viceroyal juſtice?—No; the whole tranſaction is to be found in private paſſion, and perſonal animoſity, working on an irrated mind, to commit a moſt unwarrantable injury. Another part of the defence now made on the part of the defendant, is, that he did not ſhew his protection, when when demanded by Major Sirr—this defence is as weak as as the reſt. Mr. Hevey had been three years reſident in Dublin, as a Brewer in public buſineſs, from the time of his pardon—known all over the City as a man of repute and punctuality, he was inſulted—he was injured—he was inflamed—he was conſcious of his own rectitude and ſafety—he had been pardoned, and he was not bound to anſwer Major Sirr any queſtion whatſoever. Major Sirr had no authority to arreſt him; he had full authority to reſiſt, and if Major Sirr had fallen in the conteſt, where would have been the guilt of Hevey. Every falſe impriſonment is an aſſault; this was a falſe impriſonment—every man may reſiſt an unwarrantable aſſault—and every man arreſts another at his own peril. But it was ſaid that Major Sirr had a reaſonable ground of ſuſpicion of Mr. Hevey, and therefore detained him, till he could find the manner in which Hevey had been permitted to go at large, but that was not enough; even then, Mr. Sirr had no authority to commit him to priſon, without firſt bringing him before ſome magiſtrate, and making a charge againſt him. A man who receives the benefit of his Majeſty's clemency, under the hand of the Lord Lieutenant, is as free as if he had never been found guilty; Mr. Hevey it is true, was tried by a Court-martial, but the Lord Lieutenant contradicted and reverſed their ſentence, and he gave a certificate of it, which no doubt is lodged in the proper office, to which office moſt particularly Major Sirr had an official acceſs, and muſt be conſidered as well acquainted with every pardon of that deſcription, from the very nature of his occupation in Dublin and in the Caſtle; therefore that was obviouſly a falſe pretence, the certificate of pardon is never lodged with the perſon pardoned, it remains in the office; it is never lodged in the man's hands. Mr. Hevey never ſaw his certificate of pardon, and therefore had it not to produce; for the certificate was never depoſited with him, and defendant's Council endeavour to confound a certificate of pardon with a protection—a protection is always in the hands of the perſon protected, and the pardon in the office. Mr. Hevey never ſought or got a protection, it was not neceſſary, nor would he have accepted one; becauſe a protection is granted on a confeſſion of guilt, which Mr. Hevey never made, nor never will. But the pardon was granted on a ground of innocence; and Mr. Hevey desired Mr. Sirr, when asked by him for his certificate, to ask his betters for it—no doubt it was an abrupt answer; but Mr. Hevey was not bound to answer any question; and Major Sirr's ferocity would not have induced Mr. Hevey to tell him as a favour—and is an abrupt answer to a Town-major, a sufficient authority for three days imprisonment in a dungeon, part of it in irons.

Gentlemen of the Jury, it is the Boast, it is the happiness of the British Constitution, that no man shall be wantonly deprived of his Liberty—it is a great offence in a private individual, but in a Publick officer it is a high Crime and Misdemeanor, it is an abuse of a delegated authority without just cause, punishable by heavy fines and penalties. Is it now to be said, that Mr. Sirr acted under the orders of General Craigh? there has been no evidence given of such orders; and the strongest presumption of the contrary must be entertained, what orders could warrant any man in 1801, to say to another who was in the King's Peace, and under the Law's Protection; I knew you was a Rebel in the year 1798, you have been since Pardoned, but you deserve to be hanged. What orders could warrant the defendant to arrest a peaceable citizen, in a public coffee-room—what orders could warrant Major Sirr to drag the plaintiff, like a felon through the publick streets to his office in the Castle, and pretending ignorance of his name and occupation, the Major asked him his name, asked him his residence, as if they were his crimes; although it is in evidence that the Major knew his name, and addressed him by it in the Commercial coffee-house, but pretended to forget it on the way, and then declared he would commit him to his old Lodgings in the Provost. If the defendant knew his name and residence, he must have well knew he had been discharged; if he did not know his name, what pretence had he for arresting him? In either case, he committed false imprisonment, with aggravating circumstances of the most unwarrantable (though certainly not unparalled) description. That dark and deep Inquisition, (the Provost prison,) the very existence of which would banish every principle of National Liberty, and every pretence of Personal Security from the people of Ireland, if it was suffered to remain longer the Prison and the Tomb of its inhabitants. I say that miserable dungeon has perhaps known many such scenes as this; from which the wretched ſufferers have been only releaſed, by the will of that Almighty power, whoſe omnipotence it will yet be the lot of the defendant to experience. Major Sandys appears to have been a conſiderable actor in this tranſaction; if the defendant has any defence, Major Sandys muſt know, and ſurely will not divulge it unwillingly. He can if poſſible clear up the aſperſions laid ſo heavily on his friend; Major Sandys is now attending this Court, and can tell every thing—why does not the defendant produce him, to give evidence; he may be a moſt material and deciſive evidence on the part of the defendant, if any one fact or word, of the plaintiff's caſe is capable of being diſproved—Major Sandys hears me, he ſtands by me, yet is ſilent—I call on him in the name of juſtice—I call upon him in the name of friendſhip for his friend Major Sirr, to come forward and give evidence—no; a ſentence of my client's caſe cannot be contradicted, and Major Sandys is ſilent; he was a witneſs to the whole tranſaction after Mr. Hevey's committal. If then he will not come forward for his friend, every fact ſtands admitted—but his reluctance is eaſily accounted for alſo in another way—if Major Sandys was produced, he would not ſtate any thing untruly; and therefore muſt admit upon oath the whole of my client's caſe.—He could prove the injury that my client has ſuſtained—he could prove the miſeries he underwent in the dungeon he was plunged in—he could prove the irons which bound his limbs—and the cold flags which received his wearied body as a couch—he could prove the ſcanty meal of freezing water and of muſty bread, which the charity of the priſon firſt denied, and then allowed him as a feaſt—he could prove what number of infectious maladies ventilated the dungeon to which my client was confined. But theſe would be proofs for my client, and Major Sandys is ſilent. Permit me my Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, to lay before you another circumſtance, not ſolely of a private nature, but which calls for the moſt ſerious conſideration; a circumſtance proving beyond queſtion, the moſt unconſtitutional ſuppreſſion of truth, the moſt daring and deſperate aſſault upon the conſtitution, that ever came before a Court of Juſtice. The Habeas Corpus Act forms the proud Citadel of Britiſh Liberty; it is that act which enſures perſonal ſecurity, and draws one of the firſt diſtinctions between an abſolute and a limited monarchy.

Without

Without that act, every prison might become a grave, and every officer a tyrant—by that act every person who is confined may apply for his liberation to a Judge; and if he does not appear legally confined, he is instantly set at liberty. The dreadful circumstances of the British Empire at and previous to the Rebellion, formed plausible grounds for the Legislature partially to suspend the effect of that noble Statute; and by several acts of Parliament, it was in fact, actually suspended, under certain restrictions; amongst these upon a writ of Habeas Corpus issuing, the prison keeper was enabled to return, that the prisoner was confined under a warrant of a military officer, for a State offence; and the Judge was bound to admit it. But surely if the dreadful necessity of the times, warranted a partial and temporary suspension of that statute, and gave a confidential trust and authority into military hands, to supercede civil authority and established law, it must be an offence of the highest nature to abuse that authority and trust; and convert that partial and temporary supension into a private and a revengeful purpose, it is a high crime and misdemenour, punishable by law more severely than I wish to mention—yet that crime was committed. On Mr. Hevey's arrest, a writ of Habeas Corpus issued, to bring him before a Judge, in order to be liberated—before a Judge whose benevolent mind, and constitutional principles, were measured by the number of his decisions—and at whose tomb the Law and the Constitution are struggling which shall be seen the deepest mourner—Mr. Justice Chamberlaine. But that learned Judge was defrauded of his function; a return was made to that writ of Habeas Corpus, that Mr. Hevey was confined under a warrant of General Craigh, for High Treason. A false return—a return not the truth; he was not confined under such warrant—no such warrant appears to have issued—no such offence appears to have been committed—such return was an abuse of authority—it was a fraud upon the learned Judge—it was an unconstitutional extension of an unconstitutional power—it was a great crime, and merited a great punishment. The arrest was illegal—the return was illegal—and that false return having been effectual, proves beyond contradiction, that in the person of my client, not only the individual but the general liberty of the Irish people was implicated and involved.

General Craigh has been subpœned here, by my client, to prove the falsity of that return; he has been called and called, but he has not appeared; he must have proved that the whole was a fabrication, the warrant has not been attempted to be produced in evidence; and although the negative is incapable of viva voce, proof without the personal attendance of General Craigh; and the General not appearing to do justice, you Gentlemen, are warranted in determining the whole to be a total falshood, and that no such warrant issued. Highly aggravated too, by the only person who could give decisive evidence as to that fact being at the plaintiff's back, and restrained for giving such evidence. If such a warrant had issued, it would have been the defendant's justification; but he has not justified, nor proved it, or accounted why he did not; nor has he produced Major Sandys who made that return, though he is sitting by, and therefore the defendant unequivocally admits, that there was not a charge to warrant Mr. Hevey's confinement. But why should I dwell on negative descriptions however strong or decisive; there is positive proof to establish these facts, for the witness who has told you that Mr. Hevey was detained in prison, says it was because he would not make an apology to Mr. Sirr as an individual, for a personal offence to him in the Commercial coffee-room. No man in this land is suffered by the law to gratify private malice, or to convert his own private injury, into the instruments of individual oppression.

Lord Kilwarden. Does it appear who made the return.

Mr. Barrington. My Lord, Major Sandys made it, who appears through the whole to have been the confidential, and acting instrument of Major Sirr; the witness said he saw a copy of it, but not the original. But it appears that Mr. Sandys was the Provost Martial, and the friend of Mr. Sirr, and made the return, or had it made; the witness said he saw the plaintiff in custody, in the Provost—he said that prison was appropriated for the custody of persons charged with High Treason; that he had a conversation with Major Sandys then, who required an apology from Mr. Hevey to Mr. Sirr, as the ransom of his liberation. On Mr. Hevey's arrest by Major Sirr, he was brought through the public streets to the Castle; Mr. Sirr asked plaintiff his name, as if he was ignorant of that name, though he had called him by it in the Commercial Buildings; and he made out his committal to the prison of the Provost, where Major Sandys presided with despotic authority. Could he have brought any charge of

High

High Treaſon againſt him, ſuch charge would have been ſtated in the committal. It was proved, that Mr. Sandys in perſon, ſuggeſted to plaintiff to make an apology to Mr. Sirr, and that he would be liberated. That circumſtance proved the offence beyond controverting—if Mr. Hevey was confined for High Treaſon or any publick offence; by what law, or by what authority, could Major Sandys liberate him on an apology to Major Sirr; is Major Sirr the Crown, is Major Sirr the Conſtitution, or is Major Sirr the law; does he unite in his perſon, the Legiſlative and Executive powers—if he does not, by what new revolution is a private apology to him, a ſufficient authority to diſcharge a publick offender? If then Mr. Hevey was confined for High Treaſon, Mr. Sandys ſhould forfeit his life by law, for ſuffering him at large without authority; if on the other hand, Mr. Hevey was not confined for any publick offence, Major Sirr ſhall forfeit his property for confining him—thus ſpeaks the law; it protects you, Gentlemen of the Jury, do you protect it. Gentlemen of the Jury, the damages laid in the Declaration, even if you find the full amount of them, are inadequate; you will conſider, the hardſhips inflicted on the plaintiff, when in the Provoſt priſon; till the ſtory of my client became public, I could not have believed it poſſible, that after all pretence of inſurrection had ceaſed—after having been told that Ireland would have Britiſh Liberty, when ſhe became united to Brittain—I could not have believed it poſſible, that there could have exiſted in the midſt of what is called, a Free City, a deep, dark, loathſome, and infectious dungeon; boaſting all the qualities of Baſtiles and Inquiſitions—kept by an individual, into which his Majeſty's peaceable ſubjects could be plunged without crime; and in which they could be detained, by falſe, and fabricated returns of the King's writs, under pretence of State offences. I could not have believed it poſſible Mr. Hevey could have been ſo confined, unleſs the fact had been proved before you on oath, beyond a doubt—yet the fact is ſo; and whatever my client has ſuffered, he has the gratifying conſolation of reflecting, that his diſcloſure of this tranſaction, will inform his Majeſty's Government of the dangerous abuſe of their authority, which I have no doubt they not only never knew, or countenanced, but certainly will puniſh; and have now a glorious opportunity of ſhewing this Nation, that no pretence of paſt ſervices can warrant a ſtab to the Liberty of the Country. My client may by this day's diſcloſure, give a weapon to the law, to defend the Conſtitution; and his fetters may ſecure the Liberty of the Subject. But as to damages, recur to the circumſtances of his confinement—the gates of no common priſon cloſed upon him—a loathſome, cloſe, and narrow dungeon, was his lodging; diſeaſe and miſery, were the inhabitants of the room in which he was immured—the firſt object which ſtruck the witneſs, was a wretch in the midſt of the room urged by diſorder and confinement, to the moſt diſguſting act of a human creature, every ſenſe alike affected. Another he ſaw half dreſſed in a ragged ſhirt, diſcoloured by the diſeaſe of its owner. A third, with a ſmall book reading, as he conceived, the laſt ſervices to a dead, or dying captive. He looked no more, but haſtily withdrew, nor could even the voice of friendſhip tempt him to enter further, into a place, where contagion and miſery, ſeemed the ruling powers. Yet this was the priſon choſen for my client, becauſe he would not apologize to a ſubject. There were many publick priſons in Dublin, where a perſon of his deſcription would be ſuitably accommodated; where cleanlineſs and humanity, are ſtrictly attended to; to theſe he was not taken, or before any publick officer whatſoever. The keepers of theſe priſons would not have detained him without ſome legal committal, for ſome certain crime; and this fully accounts for the place to which his perſon was conſigned—ſecret and deſpotick. Will you by your verdict ſay, that Mr. Hevey ſuſtained there, no injury from ſuch treatment. When Mr. Sirr thought proper without juſt cauſe, or legal authority, to ſeize Mr. Hevey by the collar, in the public coffee-room of the Commercial Buildings, and drag him to his office, or rather his inquiſition in the Caſtle-yard, he aſked for his protection, Mr. Hevey had no protection—but he had a better ſafeguard—he had a pardon; protections were only granted, where a culprit had confeſſed his crimes; but pardons were granted, where improper convictions or ſentences had paſſed; and when innocence, and not guilt, afterwards appeared. A protection was granted on a prior acknowledgment of guilt; a pardon is founded on a ſubſequent proof of innocence. There reſted the diſtinction; my client had no protection, for he was not guilty, but he had a pardon; for Lord Cornwallis had declared the impropriety of his conviction. If Mr. Sirr thought he had a right to enquire why my client appeared at large, he ſhould have taken Mr. Hevey before a Magiſtrate of this Metropolis, and have had the matter of fact, properly and legally inveſtigated. Do you Gentlemen of the Jury, know ſo little of the world as not to perceive, that many perſons who were in 1798 charged with rebellious practices, are not now uſeful members of ſociety, under the protection of the law, and the ſafeguard of the Conſtitution. By what new code of juriſprudence then, would Major Sirr be authoriſed, in defiance of both, to invade the Liberty of the Subject, and deſpiſe the King's pardon; is his authority created, to keep alive the dying embers of diſaffection, to make men believe they are not protected by the law, and thereby excite to new and ruinous projects for redreſs, and emancipation; and to excite the contradictory phenomenon of a petty tyranny, exiſting within a Free Conſtitution, and a Peace officer taking the moſt effectual ſteps to diſturb the growing tranquillity of the Country. Major Sirr, and Major Sandys appear correſpondent and connected in this tranſaction; my client handed from one to the other, they appear equally to underſtand each others meanings, and to forward each others objects—the one had ſeized, the other had detained my client, neither of them had authority for doing ſo, but both of them had neceſſity for ſome juſtification; they worried their imagination to find one; Mr. Hevey had been convicted, but that did not juſtify them, for Lord Cornwallis proved his innocence. Mr. Hevey was of a once preſcribed ſect, but that preſcription was at an end, and no juſtification could be found there; even fancy was in vain applied to, to find his crime and their juſtification; but even fancy failed them; and at length his crime was aſcribed to be, that he had retorted inſult, by inſult, and had preſumed to ſay, that Major Sirr had told a falſhood, and this was conceived to be a capital offence; becauſe if it was not an offence againſt the State, the provoſt priſon was not adapted to his confinement; and Major Sandys had no right to detain him, the two Majors, like Caſtor and Pollox, felt the pleaſures of mutual ſupport, and the neceſſity of mutual aſſiſtance, and when one of Demi-gods was offended, both the Demi-gods puniſhed. My client for three

three long days and nights felt the omnipotence of their power, and the punishment of his presumption; they both were culpable—both acted. Is that a reason he is not to be compensated in damages by either; to say so, would be a new species of effrontery to impose upon a just Jury, and dishonour the name of justice. There is a circumstance mentioned by one of the witnesses, which merits observation, and shews the dreadful dungeon into which my client was cast for this offence to Major Sirr; damages should be given, proportioned to the injury the complaint deserves, but how will you proportion the damages, when you recollect that this witness said he went to Mr. Hevey's room in the Provost prison, and there saw a man read out of a small book, which he took to be a book of Prayer, and as he believed upon his oath, the office of Religion for the dead, or dying man. Infection and disease had opportunely made a vacancy for my client to lie down on the same bed which was then yielding up its morbid inhabitant to the grave. In such a dismal dungeon was my unfortunate client confined without legal authority, for the space of three days, in order to force from his reluctant lips—not a confession of guilt; not an impeachment of accomplices; not a discovery of insurrections, or developement of High Treasons No; it was only to wring from his lips, an humble personal apology to Mr. Sirr!!! And under pretence of that apology to lay some ground for a future justification; the plaintiff refused to sign any apology; but by the entreaties of his friends, the consideration of his trade, his children, his health, probably his existence. An apology was extorted, without having committed an offence; and that apology dictated by Major Sandys, for his friend Major Sirr, to gratify the offended honour of the latter, is probably the first instance in any Country remote from slavery, where so outrageous and wanton an oppression could be fathered even for a moment on a government, whose name and authority was traduced by the transaction. That apology so signed by him, has been read in Court this day; you have heard it Gentlemen of the Jury,—was the refusal to sign such an apology, a justification for such an outrage; let me ask you as guardian of public Freedom, is the Liberty of the Subject, is the Liberty of the Citizens of Dublin, to be thus trampled upon with impunity!!! What man's person, or property,

property, or character, or life is one moment secure, if such transactions are not punished by most ample and exmplary damages.

My learned friend, Mr. Fletcher, has thought proper to say, that Mr. Sirr had authority to do, as he has done where he had a reasonable cause of suspicion.—In certain cases, where a Magistrate has a just ground of suspicion, and that fact or well grounded suspicion of it, verified upon oath, and in some cases without oath, he may cause that man to be apprehended and brought before himself, as a Magistrate of the place, where the man is taken; but, in this case, Mr. Sirr took upon himself, not being a Magistrate of the City of Dublin, to bring Mr. Hevey to his (Mr. Sirr's) own private office; and there, on writing down his name and place of residence, as if these were capital offences, without any other apparent cause whatsoever, without any person coming forward, or called upon to come forward and accuse him, without any admission or confession to warrant it, Major Sirr wrote a committal, committed my client to a military guard, and plunged him into a loathsome, scandalous, and infectious dungeon; not to abide the sentence of the law, but to exemplify a breach of it by his oppressor. Mr. Sirr had not any authority to confine any man, but under some legal warrant; and if he seized my client in such a manner, and confined him on suspicion some days, yet he did it at his own peril, and must abide the consequences; otherwise any Magistrate or public officer under pretence of suspicion, might indulge the cruellest tyranny with impunity. I will suppose for argument sake, my client was charged with even so great an offence as murder, or even High Treason; that he had taken his trial for the same, and that he was acquitted and discharged by due course of Law, or had been convicted and pardoned by the King, upon a satisfaction that the verdict was unjust and illegal, had the defendant a right afterwards to take up that same man, knowing these facts, (and it is clear Major Sirr from his situation and office, and the plaintiff's residence in Dublin, as a trader for three years, must have known his situation;) and to tell him, true you were on your trial, but I am not satisfied how you are at large, and therefore I will put you in prison, till you make me a written apology, for presuming to meet me in a public coffee-house; that is the true ſtatement of this caſe. Gentlemen of the Jury, if you regard liberty, or value ſecurity. you muſt mark, ſtrongly mark that tranſaction.

I am far from ſuppoſing that the Government of the Country had any ſhare in the ſpecific acts, of thoſe who may be employed under them, in the diſcharge of particular duties, much leſs, any knowledge of this tranſaction. But I am clear that the Government though not reſponſible by law for individual offences, committed without their knowledge, are by principles of common juſtice bound, to check every exceſſive exerciſe of delegated authority, and I have no doubt they will do ſo. My learned friend, Mr. Fletcher, has alſo ſaid, that the plaintiff inſulted the defendant, who is a Magiſtrate, in the execution of his office.

Lord Kilwarden.—There has not been a tittle of evidence given to ſhew, that Mr. Sirr is a Magiſtrate.

Mr. Barrington.—It lay upon the defendant to prove, firſt that he was a Magiſtrate; and next, that he was acting in the execution of his office; and thirdly, that he was inſulted; — but the contrary of all theſe three parts has been proved. Firſt, it has appeared, that he was not a Magiſtrate of the City; next, it has appeared that he was not acting in the execution of his office; and thirdly, it has appeared that he himſelf, and not the plaintiff, gave the firſt inſult—ſo that every ground of juſtification, on theſe three heads, appears falſe and fallacious. But even ſuppoſe he was a Magiſtrate of the City, and was inſulted in the execution of his office, no Magiſtrate could by law, commit him to a Baſtile or an Inquiſition, without bail or mainprize. A magiſtrate would be bound to commit him to a public priſon, on a legal committal, and bail him when required—'tis the unquestionable right of Britiſh or Iriſh ſubjects, to be committed with juſtice, confined with humanity, and bailed according to law. Here my client was committed without reaſon—confined with ſeverity—and detained without bail—every principle and practice of the law was broken in his perſon—and every principle of diſcreet policy and conſtitutional protection, violated by his impriſonment.

My learned friend, Mr. Fletcher, has thought proper to ſtate with a great deal of talent and ingenuity, many facts not proved in the caſe; and he has humourouſly told you, that probably probably a paragraph will appear in the News-paper, that on such a day, a remarkable trial was had in the Court of of King's Bench, wherein Mr. Hevey was plaintiff, and Major Sirr, a most meritorious Gentleman was defendant, when the Council for the plaintiff, made a most eloquent statement, the Jury without hesitation, found a verdict for the defendant, and fully justified the Major for his active and useful services.—But I am rather of a different opinion from that of the learned Council, for I rather think it may appear in the news-papers of to-morrow, that on this trial, the Jury on hearing decisive evidence of a most wanton and illegal imprisonment by defendant; and a plain and true statement of facts, by plaintiff's Council, notwithstanding the great exertion of defendant's Council, who most candidly used every art of sophistry in reasoning, and equivocation in fact, to mislead the Jury and puzzle themselves; the Jury considering, that the life, character, and property of every man wasinvolved in the question, instantly brought in their verdict for the plaintiff, with £5000 damages, being the full amount of the damages laid in the plaintiff's declaration; and thereby evinced the detestation of an honest and respectable Jury, to every outrage against society, and a determination to prevent such conduct in public officers in future.—This I think is the more likely paragraph of the two, and is certainly most essential to the safety and honour of the Gentlemen of the Jury. I doubt not that you will take all these impressive facts into your consideration, as guardians of the society and peace of your country; and that you will have a pride in finding such a verdict, as will shew the world, that we live yet in a Land of Liberty and Freedom.

Lord Kilwarden charged the Jury to the following effect.—Commenting on the prejudices incident to the infirm state of the human mind, his lordship said it was a weakness so universal and so interwoven in the nature of man, that judges can no more boast of being entirely exempt from them than other men. It was however their peculiar duty to guard against any impressions by which justice might eventually be perverted and the subject injured. It was equally incumbent on juries to exert the utmost vigilance and care of which they are capable, to keep their judgments free from any biaſs to which they might be ſuſceptible from the zeal or abilities of counſel, whoſe duty it was to take advantage of any caſual occurrence, which they might conceive lead to eſtabliſh the cauſe of their reſpective clients. Much eloquent declamation had been expended by gentlemen on both ſides, on tyranny, on the coercion of the government, on the decadence of our freedom, on the wiſdom of the conſtitution, and the liberty of the people. To theſe the merits of Major Sirr as a public officer, and the ſuppoſed delinquency of the Plaintiff on a former occaſion, had been ſuperadded. It was however the duty of the jury to diſcharge every idea of this nature from their conſideration, and confine themſelves to that narrow point within which the caſe will certainly be found to reſt, when deprived of all thoſe extraneous circumſtances in which it had been involved. The caſe is a very ſimple one between two private individuals, John Hevey and Charles Henry Sirr; as ſuch alone were they to conſider it; and try what reparation ſhould be made to the plaintiff for the injury he alledges to have ſuſtained, if they ſhall believe from the courſe of the evidence before them that he had ſuſtained any.

The firſt [redacted] their conſideration, muſt be to examine into the fa[redacted]eſpecting the conduct of Major Sirr to the Plaintiff, at the commercial coffee-houſe, and fairly diſcriminate between the caption of the Plaintiff, and the act of confining him in the provoſt. It was uſed in agument by counſel, that any man has authority to apprehend a ſuſpected felon, and ma[redacted] him account for himſelf. That principle cannot be con[redacted]erted; but it ſtands only with this reſervation, that the [redacted]n doing ſo muſt act at his own peril, and abide all lega[redacted]nſequences if he cannot ſubſtantiate his charge. How[redacted], although an indifferent man, that is one not inveſted w[redacted] magiſterial authority, might apprehend a ſuſpected felon, yet he has no authority to convey him to priſon without a magiſtrate's committal; therefore Major Sirr not being a magiſtrate for the city of Dublin, ſtands certainly reprehenſible in law for the particular fact of falſe impriſonment, as far as the evidence goes. The next queſtion for the conſideration of the Jury his lordſhip ſaid, muſt ariſe from the intention and motives by which Major Sirr was actuated in his conduct to the Plaintiff. If any evidence occurred to ſupport one part of Mr. Curran's ſtatement, which was,

was, that the Defendant was inſtigated by a malicious and vindictive ſpirit, in conſequence of the depoſitions which the Plaintiff made to diſcredit the oath of M'Cann on the trial of Maguire; his lordſhip aſſerted that as to the quantum of damages, he would no more heſitate at £5000 at which they were laid, than he ſhould at five-pence; but as no attempt even had been made to ſupport that allegation by any ſpecies of evidence, the Jury muſt avoid taking the principle imputed to Major Sirr into conſideration, and examine into motives as well as facts, by a fair deduction from teſtimony alone. It appeared to his lordſhip that Major Sirr was merely actuated by a ſudden impulſe of paſſion in ſeizing on Hevey, in conſequence of the abuſive language received from him; nor did he perceive any violent aggreſſion on the part of Sirr to provoke ſuch language. Whatever opinion he might have entertained of the conduct or loyalty of the Plaintiff, it was evidently not his purpoſe at that time, publicly to upbraid him with it, by a converſation held in a confidential manner, and in a low voice with the witneſs Hall. His lordſhip did not offer this obſervation in vindication of the general conduct of the Defendant,—but merely to exculpate him as he conceived he merited, from the charge of malice or revenge of which no evidence had been produced. At the ſame time it was to be regretted that Major Sirr who was certainly a very active inſtrument in tranquillizing the country, while in a ſtate of alarming perturbation, ſhould not have had ſufficient diſcretion and command of mind during the exerciſe of a temporary authority, which nothing but neceſſity alone could warrant, to exert that authority with mildneſs, even with reluctance, under the influence of public duty, and for the public good only, without any regard to perſonal feelings or irritated paſſions.

The occaſions which under Providence, ſeldom occur to compel governments to tranſcend the eſtabliſhed boundaries of the ſubject's freedom, under our happy conſtitution, are ſtill of that momentous and awful deſcription, as to call for acts of military coercion; and to theſe ſeaſonable acts have we been indebted for the reſtoration of thoſe very laws which in times of tranquillity, are ſo forcible and energetic in prohibiting the wanton intruſion of military power. It is in fact to the principle which ſo many have been pleaſed to call tyranny, that we are indebted for the preſervation of that liberty which in neceſſary inſtances muſt have been violated, in order to perpetuate its effects, and render the happineſs of a people permanent Every man inveſted with a temporary authority beyond the laws, ſhould therefore be made acquainted with the neceſſity which prompted it, and regulate his conduct by a firm undeviating regard to that duty which neceſſity impoſes, from conſiderations of the public ſafety alone; ſo that if Major Sirr inſtigated as he believed, by a momentary irritation, had ſtretched his authority in making the caption and committing the Plaintiff; ſoon as his emotions had ſubſided, he ſhould have ran with impetuoſity to liberate him. But inſtead of that he temporized, and as appeared to his lordſhip, trifled with the Plaintiff in the meſſage he ſent him, reſpecting an order to Major Sandys for his releaſe, with the latter's anſwer about his detention on a general officer's warrant, which warrant, Sirr, his lordſhip conceived muſt have had cogniſance of, before he ſent Hevey an ambiguous or fallacious meſſage.

It was ſtrongly urged by the Defendant's counſel, that Hevey carried about him the ſtigma and ſuſpicion annexed to the charact[illegible] of a condemned criminal, in conſequence of the ſentenc[illegible]t-martial, before whom he was tried in Kilkenny; [illegible]nder theſe circumſtances the conduct of the Defen[illegible]ards him could be vindicated and ſupported. To ſ[illegible] argument Lord Cornwallis's pardon is a direct and unqu[illegible]ſtionable reply. That pardon had effectually wiped out the ſtain of the Plaintiff's former delinquency, notwithſtanding the weighty recogniſances under which he ſtood fo[illegible] preſervation of the peace; nor ſhould his former errors [illegible]e been viſited on him in any point of coercion, or eve[illegible]putation, until he was guilty of ſome act by which t[illegible] cogniſances might have become forfeited.

The next and only queſtion for the conſideration of the Jury which his lordſhip urged, regarded the principle of liberal or nominal damages. If with his lordſhip the Jury could perceive no trait of malice or revenge in the conduct of Sirr, it was merely their duty to appreciate damages for the Plaintiff, according to the inconvenience he was ſubject to, or the injury he had actually ſuſtained. If on the other hand hand they found reaſon to believe, that the Plaintiff in reſiſting thoſe interrogatories which Major Sirr had put to him, immediately after conveying him to the provoſt, reſpecting a protection or ſome authority for being at large; had a view to provoke confinement, in order to lay a foundation for theſe proceedings; it ſhould then be their duty to give none but damages merely nominal. Theſe were the obſervations which occurred as neceſſary for his lordſhip to deliver, which he recommended to the Jury to weigh and compare, with perhaps many more cogent ones of their own; at the ſame time not forgetting to diſcharge their minds from every ſpecies of intemperate feeling or indignation, which different relations and comments on the ſame occurrence, might poſſibly have contributed to excite in them.

The Jury retired, and ſhortly returned with a verdict for the Plaintiff, £150 damages, with coſts.
